Specifically, the committee is asking for a justification of the fee and the benefits to the student body, the affect of instituting partial and complete user fees, the request and justification for changes in current fee levels and any other additional information requested by the committee.

"A fee dollar is a hell of a lot of money," Tomb said. "We want to make sure student money is being spent right."

A fee dollar can equal $32,000 to $35,000 per year, depending on the enrollment figures for full-time and part-time students.

"The mentality is that people are being forced out of higher education due to the cost," Potter said. "Some people are making their decisions based on dollars."

User fees were part of the platform on which Student Body President Jeff Peterson and Student Body Vice President Brad Finkeldei ran for re-election in April.

Peterson said in a press conference earlier this semester that user fees might be one way K-State could become more competitive with other universities.

"We know it's important to have services," Finkeldei said. "We thought this was a feasible way to decrease cost and not hurt services."

During the Access the Future campaign last year, Finkeldei said he and Peterson were asked what they were doing at K-State to lower the financial burden on students.

Access the Future was a Legislative lobbying effort to keep tuition low.

Prompted by those questions, Peterson and Finkeldei began looking into ways to decrease campus privilege fees, he said.

"I think the response from students is very positive on the whole," Finkeldei said.

The response Peterson and Finkeldei said they received from students during the election about user fees was positive.

"There's some concern for people directly affected because they work there or use the service a lot," he said.

At this stage, the councils are looking into justifying their fees, he said.

"I think it's important to make a distinction between services and vital services," Finkeldei said.

The distinction could be difficult to make, he said.

K-State administrators said they do not think user fees are a viable option for decreasing the amount of money students pay to attend K-State.

"There is no way to put a service on an optional income," Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said.

Krause said he supported the idea of the budget resolution passed by Senate on Sept. 7, but he said he thought the user-fee concept is just not a practical solution. Services should be looking at how they do things so they can make changes or cut duplicate programs, he said.

Many of the services on campus have blended user fees with the student fees, he said. Lafene charges for pharmacy and laboratory work.

"User fees have always been an important part of our service system on campus," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life and associate vice president for institutional advancement.

The University has always tried to keep a balance between user fees and privilege fees to fund services, he said. However, the balance between the two types of fees should be looked at and reviewed to make sure the balance is maintained.

"It is valid to look at the balance as long as the group looking into it doesn't have an agenda," Bosco said.

The quality of service provided on campus could be threatened by a user-fee system, he said.

Krause said the University must be able to respond and adjust to the needs of each incoming class. By changing to a user-fee system, the University would not be able to respond to those needs.

"You don't run a multi-million dollar operation on a user-fee basis," Krause said. "To switch to a system based completely on user fees is not practical."

The question of user fees really comes down to what kind of a community the students want to have, he said. Students might have to pay for things they do not use to keep up the quality of the service for others.

Krause said the privilege-fee system is much like the tax structure of other communities. Krause said he hopes he never has to use the fire department, but he will pay for it so it will be there for him if he should need it.

Bernard Franklin, dean of student life, said he thought the intent of the resolution was noble but he did not think students realized how much time and work goes into being a regent.

Franklin, who is a K-State graduate and was K-State student body president, served on the board from 1977-81 when he was 24 and working at his first job out of college.

"It is an enormous responsibility for one person so early in their career," he said.

Because of the time and financial commitments required, most of the appointees to the board are retired or wealthy people with a high-ranking position in their field, such as a senior partner in a law firm or a vice president of a bank, Franklin said.

It would also be difficult for students to serve on the board unless they were only part-time students or independently wealthy, Franklin said.

"I don't think I know many students that could do it," he said.

Aaron Otto, chairman of the Government Relations Committee, which wrote the legislation, said if the resolution passes tonight, the Government Relations Committee will start looking for a qualified candidates who are willing to fill the position.

The daylight population is the people who live or work on the base during a normal day.

"There is currently a daylight population of 36,000. This number includes soldiers, their families and civilian workforce. When the downsizing is completed the daylight population will be about 28,000," said Maj. Ben Santos, public affairs officer for the 1st Infantry Division Artillery.

Santos was not able to give a figure of how many civilian jobs would be lost.

But Santos said about 200 civilian jobs will become available beginning March 1996 because the Southwest Region Personnel Office is coming to Fort Riley.

Fort Riley is losing soldiers through normal change of station assignment and retirement. Only now, because of downsizing, these positions are not being filled, Santos said.

Devon Rowe, headquarter and headquarters' battery of the 1st Division Artillery, said there is a great history of the post and of the 1st Infantry Division Artillery, and the deactivation has been difficult.

"Deactivating has been tough. It's tough emotionally, and we've been spending long hours getting the unit ready and the equipment up to standards," Rowe said.

doesn't hit students very hard and spreads it out as evenly as possible."

Students and administrators have contacted Kassebaum's office and voiced their opposition to the bill. Students packed the committee meeting room in Washington, D.C. Tuesday to protest wearing buttons that read: "Stop the raid on student aid."

In addition, the committee passed the bill with a narrow 8-7 vote.

"It ultimately hurts the very people they're trying to help," Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said.

The bill is to be debated and voted upon by Senate in early October.

Mary Kay reveals fashion, beauty secrets

Tonya Bobbitt

Style is just an image thing.

"Your image of style is just waiting to be discovered," Stella Houston, a Mary Kay Cosmetics consultant, said.

Creating your own style and knowing what looks good was the topic at a beauty presentation sponsored by Zeta Phi Beta, Wednesday night.

The program, Sistas from Head to Toe, gave women of color a chance to learn about enhancing their make-up and accentuating their wardrobes, Tamara Jordan, senior in electronic journalism and president of Zeta Phi Beta, said.

"This is an opportunity for women of color to learn more about their skin and how to dress for success," Jordan said.

This program is for women of color to learn more about themselves and how to make themselves more beautiful, Jordan said.

"This is not a promotion for Mary Kay, but women will be allowed to make orders and ask questions," Jordan said

The program was also a way to bring the sororities of color together, she said.

"This is the first time we had an event like this," Jordan said. "This is also an opportunity to bridge the gap between the sororities of color."

A slide presentation about skin care, glamour and wardrobe presentation also demonstrated the importance of appearance.

"I'm here to share with you the importance of a professional appearance, because once you know the basics, you can experiment and find the right look for you," Houston said.

Students can change their images by starting with what they already have in their closets, learning how to apply and find the right make-up and knowing how to put these two things together with the right accessories.

"Women are truly beautiful. Not from the outside in, but from the inside out," Houston said.

Ten women from Delta Sigma Theta, Sigma Lambda Gamma, Sigma Gamma Rho, Alpha Kappa Alpha and Zeta Phi Beta received makeovers.

The women also modeled their own clothes.

Collegiate licensing funds scholarships

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

A group of students on campus are putting money into K-State's scholarship funds, while getting a taste of what their future careers might be like.

The K-State Advances Through Support program is a student-run marketing program in which students are in charge of promoting collegiate licensing.

Licensed manufacturers who sell products bearing K-State logos pay a percentage of the wholesale price to K-State, which uses the revenues for student scholarships.

The revenues are divided into scholarships for student athletes, students participating in the KATS program and the general scholarship fund.

This year, $220,000 was collected from the sale of licensed merchandise. About $70,000 went toward the general scholarship fund and scholarships for the band and cheerleaders, and $115,000 went toward athletic scholarships.

The remaining amount was split between the Collegiate Licensing Company's share and the KATS programs share.

Money for the general scholarship fund was awarded to student leaders with high academic standing, said Larry Moeder, director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

The revenues also funded scholarships for student athletes, and scholarships for students participating in the KATS program.

At most universities students do not benefit from the sale of merchandise bearing university logos.

"We are one of a minority of universities that have this money going back into scholarships for the general student body," said John Fairman, assistant vice president for university relations.

The Collegiate Licensing Company, which works with about 150 universities, oversees and enforces the licensing of manufacturers, and checks the quality of the merchandise.

"They offer a legal and standards check that would be very difficult for us to do," Fairman said.

KATS, now in its fifth year, was established by Fairman and Richard Burke, instructor of marketing, to give marketing and journalism students hands-on experience in their area of study, as well as educate the public about the licensing program.

"Until this program got going, there were far more options of non-licensed products than licensed," Burke said.

Four to five students, selected from Burke's promotional strategies class by previous KATS members, plan and implement strategies that promote the program.

"It's good experience for the students because they're doing something that is real. It's not just a paper," Burke said.

Students also work with retailers, educating them about the importance of selling licensed products.

"We try to encourage them to only sell Collegiate Licensed products, and we've been very successful," Burke said.

"It's good public relations for them because they can say, 'hey, buy this sweatshirt because some of the money goes back to the students.'"

The program is a win-win situation for everyone, Burke said.

"Not only is it good for the students in my class, but it is good for retailers, student athletes and other students," he said.

Before the KATS program was instituted, there were no scholarships for marching band members. Now, about 30 to 40 band members are getting a scholarship thanks to the money that licensed product sales bring back to the students, Frank Tracz, director of bands, said.

Paul Russell, senior in journalism and mass communications and KATS participant, said the whole experience has been good.

"Basically what it's done for me is that it's given me the opportunity to experience first-hand what I'll do when I graduate," he said.

People should look for the official Collegiate Licensed Product seal when they buy K-State merchandise, Russell said.

"People need to be aware that even though the purchase price could be a little higher when it's got the seal, they will know it's good quality merchandise and that the money comes back to the students," he said.

Police protection planned for pope

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Tucked away somewhere in New York City is a symbol of the perils of being Pope John Paul II: the Popemobile.

The armored, bubble-topped Mercedes — a legacy of a 1981 assassination attempt — was shipped by the Vatican to the United States on Sept. 9. Divulging the vehicle's exact location, authorities said, would compromise security for the pope's U.S. visit Oct. 4-8.

"We don't even know where it is," said Bill Ryan, spokesman for the U.S. Catholic Congress.

Shrouding many details in secrecy, law-enforcement officials have launched an unprecedented effort to protect John Paul during his trip to New York, New Jersey and Maryland.

During his last visit to the New York area in 1979, the pope sometimes traveled in an open limousine and freely mixed with worshipers. No more.

The risk of terrorism on U.S. soil now dictates much tighter security.

Local and federal officials refused to say how many officers will form the papal security force or how much it will cost. The chief of the New York Police Department, Louis Anemone, denied one report that the department will spend $6 million just on overtime.

But officials outlined a security strategy that combines sheer manpower with technology.

The Secret Service has recruited agents from other agencies — including the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the Immigration and Naturalization Service and the Internal Revenue Service — to amass a federal contingent in the thousands.

"It's easily the largest undertaking in Secret Service history," spokesman Gerry Byrnes said.

Secret Service agents will team up with a small, plainclothes detachment of the Swiss Guards, who have guarded popes for centuries, to act as the pontiff's bodyguards. Among the agents' duties are driving the Popemobile during appearances at Giants Stadium, Aqueduct Racetrack, the Great Lawn in Central Park, St. Patrick's Cathedral and Camden Yards in Baltimore.

In Baltimore, metal detectors will be installed at the ballpark for a Mass expected to draw 48,000 people. Afterward, the pope is to travel by Popemobile along a parade route stripped of all mailboxes and trash cans.

The 38,000-member NYPD plans to keep thousands of extra uniformed officers on duty.

The department also has trained an additional 400 detectives in dignitary protection, both for the papal visit and next month's celebration of the United Nations' 50th anniversary.

By land, officers will:

- Search and secure each site the pope visits, setting up metal detectors to screen worshipers. A virtual wall of uniformed officers will ring the Great Lawn.
- Form a security zone on the Upper East Side around an official Catholic residence where John Paul will sleep.
- Mingle in plainclothes with the throngs of worshipers and onlookers, including the 117,000 people holding tickets to the Mass in Central Park.
- Orchestrate at least 10 presidential-type motorcades as the pontiff moves about Manhattan. Police are advising New Yorkers to use public transportation to avoid traffic jams.

Pope John Paul II will visit the United States Oct. 4-8. Tickets for Mass and events where the Pope will speak are sold out.

Sorry, we're all out of pope-on-a-rope

Associated Press

JERSEY CITY, N.J. — When Pope John Paul II comes to town, followers can sport their pope T-shirts and avoid being late for Mass with their pope watches.

And when that thirst hits from waiting for him with thousands of others, a sip from a pope water bottle should do the trick. Need to call home? Grab a pope phone card.

For some, the pope's four-day visit to New Jersey, New York and Maryland in two weeks has more than spiritual value: There's money to be made from merchandising.

"There's not one item here that's tacky," said Robert Villani, president of Robbi Promotional Adver-tising in Newark, the official licensee selected by the archdioceses of Newark and New York.

Souvenirs, including posters, calendars, books and rosaries, were put on sale Tuesday at a mall in Jersey City and will be sold at 12 other malls across New Jersey.

The items also will be sold at events in New York and Villani plans to sell them by mail and on cable TV.

Edward Granger of Jersey City stopped by the souvenir booth at the mall to inspect the products.

"I don't have a problem with the merchandising of it. As long as you don't lose sight of the meaning behind it," he said.

The 75-year-old pope originally planned to visit the region last October but was forced to reschedule the trip because of his hip-replacement surgery. He is scheduled to arrive in Newark on Oct. 4 and depart from Baltimore on Oct. 8.

In between, he will address the United Nations and celebrate Mass in four dioceses: at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J.; Aqueduct Raceway in the New York borough of Queens; Manhattan's Central Park; and at Camden Yards baseball stadium in Baltimore.

It will be the first visit by a pope to New Jersey or Baltimore, and the third time a pope has visited New York.

Villani hopes to sell a total of $7.5 million worth of merchandise at the New Jersey and New York events. He lost between $100,000 and $500,000 when the pope's visit was canceled last year, he said.

In Baltimore, the archdiocese is taking a low-key approach.

"We're making sure the retailers get what they want, but we're not backing up a semi to the store," said Bill Blaul, communications director for the archdiocese.

HBI Graphics in Maryland, licensee for the Baltimore Archdiocese, will sell coffee cups, T-shirts and caps with the archdiocese logo, but not the pope's picture.

"We just wanted to be very cautious with respect to what items we were going to put the pope's image on," Blaul said.

Villani said he put the pope's likeness on his souvenirs because Pope John Paul will sell.

His souvenirs run from $4 reflective bookmarks — one with a hologram of a crucifix and the other with a hologram of Jesus' head — to a $125 sterling silver commemorative medallion.

There are watches with the pope's face on them, T-shirts with a sketch of the pope surrounded by New York landmarks and rosary beads with a picture of the pope on an attached pendant.

The New York Archdiocese has approved all 22 products for Villani to sell, but the Newark Archdiocese has only approved 14. The watches, bookmarks and pope phone cards have yet to be approved in New Jersey.

The Newark and New York archdioceses will get about 20 percent of all sales, officials said. The Baltimore Archdiocese would not say how much it expects to make from souvenirs.

Stephen Michalek, a member of the souvenirs committee for the Newark Archdiocese, said besides raising money, the merchandise could get more children involved with the church.

His 12-year-old son, Steve, still wears his T-shirt from last year's canceled visit.

"He's into Nirvana, he's into Live, he's into the New York Giants, and he's also into the pope," Michalek said of his son.

K-State ROTC honors soldiers at Wagner Field

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

A few Fort Riley soldiers had a chance to watch K-State crush Akron Saturday during Fort Riley Day at Wagner Field.

K-State ROTC sponsored the annual event, which recognizes the contributions of Fort Riley's soldiers to K-State.

"Basically, most of our training that we do as far as field training exercises takes place at Fort Riley," Darryl Lank, member of K-State ROTC, said. "They let us use their facilities, which is a pretty good advantage for our program."

The event also allowed soldiers and K-State students to interact in a fun and healthy environment.

"Back several years ago, the staff at Fort Riley would play faculty and students from K-State in flag football," said Scott Price, community relations officer at Fort Riley.

Soldiers who might not be able to afford the price of a ticket had the opportunity to see something new.

"The soldiers had a lot of fun," Price said. "A day like that may have ordinarily been out of price range for some individuals."

The Military Affairs Committee and local Manhattan merchants provided Fort Riley soldiers with 100 tickets.

"We used the tickets as incentives to reward the best soldiers," Price said. "The day is a win-win situation for everyone involved."

In addition to the soldiers in the stands, Fort Riley's band and the 1st Infantry Division Band put on a performance during halftime.

Performing at halftime gave the band an opportunity to share in the excitement, Price said.

The U.S. Air Force also joined Fort Riley Day by providing three Air Force A-10 planes that flew over at halftime.

All three pilots, Lt. Col. George D. Burgess, Maj. Andrew V. Duffin and Capt. Brian K. Borgen are K-State alumni and Air Force ROTC participants.

▶ FREEDOM TO FARM BILL

Republicans oppose Roberts' plan

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House Agriculture Committee abandoned efforts Wednesday to dismantle traditional farm programs after cotton-state Republicans refused to give up an elaborate system of loans and subsidies.

A similar effort in the Senate was foundering over opposition from senators representing sugar and peanut states.

The House panel's chairman, Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said he would move the measure through the House Budget Committee as part of a larger package to balance the budget by 2002.

"I'll be playing a leading role," Roberts said after a closed meeting of his committee's 27 Republicans failed to produce an agreement.

As Roberts' efforts collapsed, the Senate Agriculture Committee also faced a serious roadblock in its effort to find at least $13.4 billion in farm program savings, a 17-percent reduction, over seven years.

The committee halted work Wednesday without an agreement following a dispute over programs that help sugar and peanut growers.

The disputes test the resolve of Republicans to alter long-established programs while they are overhauling much newer programs such as welfare. The farm programs have become ingrained in both parties, with support based more on regional than political concerns.

Roberts had tried to overcome that with his "Freedom to Farm" bill. The proposal met the new House Republican leadership's need for change while guaranteeing farmers a fixed but declining payment to ease the transition to an end to crop subsidies, production controls and mandatory land idling.

But the resistance came from Reps. Bill Emerson, R-Mo., Larry Combest, R-Texas, Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., and Richard Baker, R-La.

All four come from states that grow cotton, a crop that depends heavily on an elaborate system of loans, subsidies and production controls.

The four said their opposition extended beyond cotton. Their votes, combined with the opposition of all 22 Democrats, defeated the measure last Wednesday.

Emerson and Combest had proposed an alternative that would have preserved basic programs but made fewer acres eligible for subsidies.

Negotiations went nowhere, Chambliss said, because Roberts made it clear he would go to the Budget Committee if the dissident Republicans didn't yield.

"We had no pressure to settle because we knew that's what was going to happen," Chambliss said.

Despite the setback, Roberts said his proposal will win because of the leadership's support, including that of Budget Chairman John Kasich, R-Ohio.

"I fully expect the final product to be the Freedom to Farm Act," he told reporters.

The Senate Agriculture Committee, meanwhile, quit work Wednesday after a fight over how the government protects sugar and peanut producers. Demanding more change than seemed likely, Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., sided with the committee's eight Democrats to halt further work on the bill.

"I thought we needed to have equitable reform across the board, and peanuts and sugar are taking a walk," he said.

Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, said he wanted to extend protections for the beet sugar growers in his state beyond 1997, when the sugar program expires.

"I've got 600,000 acres and a very large work force in Idaho and a very large hunk of Idaho farmers that are involved in this commodity," he said.

The farm bill needs to ease growers to a freer market, he said..

The measure before the Senate committee offers a more modest attempt at change than Roberts tried to push. Saving $13.6 billion — slightly more than the $13.4 billion requested from budget writers — it would double to 30 percent the number of corn, cotton, rice and wheat acres excluded from subsidy payments. It would cap spending for subsidies.

Corn and wheat growers would be free to switch crops without losing government payments. Cotton and rice growers would maintain restrictions on acres that could enter and leave the program.

The bill would end the government's ability to force growers to idle their acres, controlling both surpluses and government spending.

The Senate version would gradually remove price supports for dairy but would also cancel the fee that dairy farmers pay for their program. The Roberts bill would go further and end the system of minimum pricing and other regulation for dairy.

Democrats on the House and Senate Agriculture committees have protested the 17 percent in cuts and said they'll work on a farm bill after President Clinton's certain veto of the Republicans' budget-balancing legislation.

Roberts' bill acquired new life in the Senate, meanwhile. Rep. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, offered a version on the Senate floor that embraces the Roberts changes but calls for just $10 billion in savings.

Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan. and a member of the Agriculture Committee, indicated he might offer the Roberts proposal as an amendment to the bill before the committee. But he also expressed concern that the bill would be criticized as welfare.

Sports on the web: bring photos, stats home to your PC

Darin Siefkes

This week's topic is sports homepages, previewed using Netscape 1.1N (http://home.netscape.com).

Up-to-the-minute scores are brought to a home computer in seconds with this page, and they are joined with in-depth articles on what's new in the sporting world.

The Sportszone adds previews of top-25 college games and a Heisman Trophy watch, along with college football articles and recaps of all the games in baseball and football. Sportszone is laid out like a sports paper, so it is easy to traverse.

The National Hockey League has put together the best of the professional sports pages.

Included is all the necessary information fans need to know about their teams. Team rosters, stats, game schedules and current press releases are listed.

The NHL also puts players on Internet Relay Chat for conversations with web users, and directions are given on how to use it. The June 4 draft is included.

For hardcore fans, there is a daily trivia question, a text version of the Stanley Cup winners and the entire NHL rules book.

Major-league baseball has blundered onto the Net with a bad page. The graphics are boring, it doesn't give any information of much use, and it is shown up in baseball coverage by ESPN. Navigate it at your own peril.

The NFL has also flexed its marketing muscle on the Net. The organization has included normal team data, NFL rules and record books.

There are some notable differences between this and other sports pages. It has a kid's section with interviews of NFL stars that many adults can also enjoy.

The NFL also publishes its own paper that it now provides on-line.

Good graphics set this page off and help make it an enjoyable experience.

Ladies and gentlemen of Wildcat Land — this page is for you. Simply put, this is the best page of college football on the Web today.

This page shows the K-State football program in all its glory. A quick tour of all athletic areas is provided. Coach Bill Snyder's engineered transformation of the worst team in college football history into a top-25 contender is shown remarkably well.

"The Record" section has pictures from K-State's consecutive bowl appearances, along with a couple statistics in which K-State fares well.

"The Fans" section has some memorable quotes from recent years. The page's authors have also started previewing each of the Cats' weekly opponents, complete with stats and other team info.

The only difficulty with this page is the time it takes to download parts of it. Sections like the athletic tour need to be more user-friendly for off-campus users.

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

Vivian Ferguson (foreground), junior in theater; Billy Williams, sophomore in art; and Donna Davenport, freshman in theater, rehearse their parts for the play "From Okra to Greens" Tuesday evening in the Purple Masque Theatre. The production, which begins tonight at 8, runs through Saturday.

Play focuses on abuse, love, sex in relationships

Claudette Riley
staff writer

A different kind of love story is played out in "From Okra to Greens."

The play, put on by the Ebony Theatre Company, opens at 8 tonight at the Purple Masque Theatre. The production runs through Saturday night.

Jeneena Hubbard, director and senior in music, chose this one-act play from Ntozake Shange. This is her third turn as a director for Ebony Theatre.

"Shange is a playwright who is often overlooked," Hubbard said. "I picked this piece because it's poetry and because it's different and challenging. She is a combination poet and playwright."

As the piece centers around the love story between Okra (Vivian Ferguson, junior in theater) and Greens (Billy Williams, sophomore in art), it also discusses social and political issues.

"It's not just a love story between Okra and Greens, but between them and the whole world," Hubbard said. "Shange is so deep that when someone reads her stuff, they must read it several times and look at it different ways."

The broader issues include a discussion of the military situation of Haiti in French and the physical and emotional abuse that takes place within relationships.

The focus is on Okra's life and what happens through her eyes.

"It starts out with sensuality — the love, and then she experiences rape by her mate, and returns to him, returns to this abusive relationship," Hubbard said.

"We see the stupidity of staying in an abusive relationship, and, although there's a happy ending, we have to ask ourselves how she could do the things she did."

The sexual contact was staged rhythmically and tastefully but is for mature audiences, Hubbard said.

Aundray Collins, freshman in theater, is one of three dancers who give a visual interpretation of segments during which the main characters speak.

"We, in essence, act out the parts that can't be imagined," Collins said. "It's phenomenal poetry and has a lot of meaning and a lot of symbolism."

In addition to the rhythmic flow of the sequential poetry in this play, Hubbard also used music from certain artists suggested by the playwright. Music from Bob Marley and the artist formerly known as Prince is interspersed with native African music.

Collins believes the power of the music helps the material speak to people individually.

"There are many themes at work. There is definitely love, respect for your race, knowing where you came from and having a value for humanity," Collins said.

Okra's criticism of the way men treat women is a pivotal point of the performance, Collins said.

"There is an element of a roller coaster in their relationship," Collins said.

"They start out loving each other, and the end is loving, but it's really about how they grow and learn about the world through each other's eyes."

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

▶ AIR FORCE

Military punishes general for affair

■ Air force commander commits adultery, loses job

Associated Press

PHOENIX — An extramarital affair with a civilian cost an Air Force general his career because military men and women are held to a higher standard, said a Pentagon spokesman.

A report released Tuesday confirmed that former Lt. Gen. Thomas R. Griffith was demoted for having the affair with a woman he met at an Air Force conference in Virginia.

Griffith was relieved June 26 as commander of the 12th Air Force and U.S. Southern Command Air Forces, where he oversaw 530 planes and 43,000 service men and women. He has since retired, at the request of his superiors.

The heavily censored report, obtained by The Associated Press under the Freedom of Information Act, confirmed what anonymous sources said at the time of Griffith's dismissal and other added details.

Griffith, a fighter pilot and 28-year veteran who was stationed at Davis-Monthan Air Force Base in Tucson, also was demoted from lieutenant to major general, said Capt. Les Kodlick, a spokesman for the secretary of the Air Force in Washington, D.C.

"People in the military are held to a higher standard of behavior," Kodlick said. He could not say how often officers are punished for adultery.

The report, by the Air Force Inspector General's Office, stated that the general met the woman at a two-day management conference in April. Her name was blacked out in the report. The relationship continued by telephone and in person when Griffith made official trips to the East Coast in May and June, it read.

"The preponderance of evidence supported the conclusion that Gen. Griffith, on at least one occasion, committed adultery, defined as sexual intercourse between a married man and a woman not his wife," according to the report.

The report also said $20.02 worth of calls were made to the woman at taxpayer expense and Griffith reimbursed the Air Force for those calls. Investigators found no evidence of unusual travel, including early departures or delayed returns on official trips.

Bomb threat halts classes

J. Scot
staff reporter

The K-State Student Union, Denison and Eisenhower halls had to be evacuated due to a bomb threat Thursday morning.

"It was 10:58 a.m. when the call came in.. An unknown male who disguised his voice advised that a bomb would go off at 11:15 a.m. in the Union, Denison and Eisenhower halls," Sgt. Larry Freebe of the Riley County Police Department said.

If the call would have come in via 911, the police would have had the phone number, but at this time they are unsure what line it came in on, he said.

RCPD received the terrorist's threat and contacted K-State Police.

"All I know for sure is that Denison, Eisenhower and the Union threats all came in on the same call," Capt. Robert Mellgren of the campus police said.

When campus police got the call from RCPD,

▶ STUDENT SENATE

Senate fails to change allocation

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate failed four times to change the votes for the Alpha Phi Alpha allocation approved last week.

Alpha Phi Alpha is a social fraternity, and it requested $1,694.80 for its annual step show. Senate does not usually fund social fraternities. Some senators said they did not know Alpha Phi Alpha was a social fraternity, and they wanted to change their votes.

The first attempt to change votes was made during the approval of the Sept. 21 minutes. Steve Weatherman, business senator, asked for unanimous consent to allow him to change his vote on the allocation.

An objection was raised, so the motion failed.

Weatherman moved to reconsider the Alpha Phi Alpha allocation. Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, seconded it.

John Potter, Senate chairman, ruled the motion in order, but Chris Avila, Allocations Committee chairman, appealed the decision of the chairman.

Avila argued that because Senate had already passed the bill, it could not be reconsidered. He said the motion to reconsider should have been made last week. Because the bill was an allocation, it is a contract with the fraternity that can't be broken, Avila said.

Avila said he saw two options. The first was to throw out Robert's Rules of Order. The second was to wait for the student body president to veto the bill and reconsider it next week.

Avila withdrew his appeal, and Weatherman withdrew the motion for reconsideration.

LeDoux moved to suspend the rules for the sole purpose of allowing members to change their votes and for members to cast votes.

"All I want to do is change my vote," LeDoux said. "I've already said I cast a wrong vote."

City completing ADA projects

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

Manhattan is in its final phase of projects needed to comply with Americans with Disabilities Act, but it still has more than $25,000 in improvements to make.

The Manhattan Human Rights and Services Board met Thursday night to hear a progress report of the 1995 self-evaluation of progress made by the city to comply with the ADA.The board members also heard from concerned citizens during a public comment session.

Al Martin, ADA coordinator, said the city has made much progress toward complying with ADA.

"We are so far ahead of any other city of our size that it is incomparable, at least of what I know of," Martin said.

Martin said city staff have come up with nine recommendations the board needs to approve and present to the City Commission.

Repair of curb ramps for wheelchair accessibility are partially complete, and the remainder of ramps to be repaired should be finished by the end of the year or sooner, Martin said.

The city was required to put in the ramps after losing a lawsuit in summer 1994. The deadline to have the project completed was Jan. 25, 1995. The deadline was extended by the judge, because the city could not finish on time.

He said the city has created the proper number of reserved parking spots for city parking lots. City Hall still needs to be made more accessible to comply with the act, Martin said.

Many of the recommendations fall under the jurisdiction of the city's parks and recreation department.

Martin said water fountains and concession stands in the park and at other facilities need to be lowered so people in wheelchairs can reach them.

Shelter houses in the park also need to be made handicap accessible, and he said this has already been accomplished for many of the shelters. The remaining shelters will be finished by January, he said.

The wood-chip track that circles the park also needs to be made wheelchair accessible. To do this, Martin said a shaved limestone track should be created at a cost of $8,000 to $9,000. A wheelchair lift is needed for the stage in the park as well, Martin said.

The parks and recreation department will also have to purchase a four-seat electric golf cart for Sunset Zoo for tours taken by disabled people.

Martin said the total cost for the parks and recreation department to comply with the ADA is estimated at $25,000.

The price of health care

Lisa Elliott

Student health care costs could triple if Lafene Health Center is moved to the user-fee system, the Lafene director said.

"The cost to the user would be what you'd have to pay in the community," Lanny Zweimiller, Lafene director, said.

Lab work, X-rays and prescriptions cost about one-third of what they would at an outside health care facility, he said.

Office visits to Lafene are free, but there could be a charge if the fee was changed.

Lafene could make more user fees, Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said.

One idea Tomb and his committee have considered is decreasing the fee and increasing basic user fees for services, such as office visits and lab work.

University Counseling Services already charges for the sixth visit. Tomb said he saw no reason why Lafene could not charge a $10 visitation fee after a set number of visits in a semester. Office visits might cost anywhere from $50 to $70 in the private sector, he said.

"If you go to three visits at Lafene, you've made your $70 twice over," he said. "To implement a total user fee system at Lafene would be difficult."

About 70 percent of the Lafene budget comes from the student health fees, Zweimiller said. Twenty-five to 30 percent of the budget comes from fees for services.

About 13,000 students use Lafene annually, he said. Only about 55 percent of the students who usé Lafene have health insurance. If the fee is reduced or made optional, students could find access to services limited, Zweimiller said.

"We'd have to cut services because there would just be no way users could afford services," he said.

There would not be enough funds to keep the staff at the same size, and the free health education program would be severely cut back or eliminated, he said.

"It's a general taxation," Zweimiller said. "It helps spread the cost over several payers to keep cost down for those who use it."

Memorial Hospital is subsidized by tax money, he said. Lafene's funding is no different from the funding of hospitals in the outside world.

"We've got to look at the big picture," he said. "Such a broad range of services, students couldn't afford it on a user-fee basis."

The Student Health Advisory Committee has formed a subcommittee that is looking into the finances of Lafene and recommendations for its fee.

"Right now, we have a whole bunch of thoughts. We'll be looking at formulating our recommendation next," Zweimiller said.

Health-care cost comparisons

If the proposed user-fee system is approved, students would pay only when they use Lafene's services. If the system is approved, student health-care costs could triple. Here is a comparison of private health-care costs to Lafene's student rates.

| Lafene | Private health care |
| Student health fee of $70 and free office visits | Students pay $45 to $70 for each office visit |
| The cost of lab work is subsidized, making it less expensive than private health care | Private health care charges more for lab work because it is not subsidized with a student health fee |

▶ FAMILY WEEKEND

Parents, siblings to visit KSU

Jeremy Crabtree
staff reporter

K-State opens its doors to families from across the nation this weekend.

Family Weekend begins today, and parents and siblings will wander around campus catching snippets of student life until Sunday.

From Roots to Wings

Becky Klingler, director of constituent programs for the KSU Alumni Association and Family Weekend organizer, said there are more families coming to this year's activities than last year.

"Response for this year's weekend has been extraordinary," she said. "We're a little ahead of last year. One of the things that we've seen is that a lot of people are just interested in football tickets."

But more than football is planned for the weekend.

A family's first stop, if they have made reservations, should be the Family Weekend information booth in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

"Families can retrieve their family packets, scheduling information, football tickets and maps to the activities," Klingler said.

The booth will be open from 5 to 8:30 p.m. Friday and 8:30 a.m. to noon Saturday.

A pig roast dinner will be eaten Friday from 6 to 7:30 p.m. in the Union Main Ballroom.

Activities Saturday will include campus tour and family portraits with Willie the Wildcat, and several colleges are having open houses and receptions.

"I would recommend going to the Taste of K-State," Klingler said. "The agriculture college puts together a really neat program."

The Taste of K-State is from 9 a.m. to noon Saturday.

"They can go to Shellenberger Hall and taste the bread products. Then they can go to Call Hall and taste meat and cheese. Everyone likes to eat," Klingler said.

A Taste of the Internet will demonstrate uses of the Internet by visiting the White House, the Australian Botanical Gardens and showing how people around the world are accessing information about K-State on the World Wide Web. The internet tours will be at 9, 10 and 10:30 a.m. in Nichols 122.

▶ MAIN BREAK LEAVES WICHITA RESIDENTS WITHOUT RUNNING WATER

WICHITA (AP) — The city's 300,000 residents were without running water for several hours Thursday when a water main broke near a water filter plant, shorting out the electrical system that pumps water through the city.

A 48-inch main ruptured about 5 a.m., flooding an electrical substation outside the filter plant on the city's northwest side, officials said.

Power was restored by midmorning and water began pumping shortly before noon, Geanine Forbes, a secretary in the city water department, said.

The problem caused classes to be canceled in at least one school. Wichita State University canceled classes until 5:30 p.m. Thursday.

Customers of Bank IV throughout Kansas and Oklahoma were unable to access the bank's Via ATM network until water was restored.

Bank spokesman Brent Thompson said the network's main computer in downtown Wichita is dependent on air conditioning — which in turn depends on water. The ATMs came back up when the water began flowing again.

▶ ILLINOIS REPRESENTATIVE STEPS DOWN FOLLOWING CONVICTION

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. Mel Reynolds, D-Ill., has announced his resignation from Congress, effective Oct. 1.

The sentence came after the congressman made an angry, rambling, 40-minute statement, saying he was the victim of racism on the part of prosecutors and the media.

"When they shackle me, like they shackled my slave ancestors and take me off to jail, nobody in this room will see me crawl," a defiant Reynolds said.

Judge Fred Suria, of Cook County Circuit Court, rejected Reynolds' suggestion that race played a role.

"This case is not about race," Suria said. "This case is not about politics." He said Reynolds was not singled out and had betrayed his trust as a man, as a father and as an elected official.

"You blew it," Suria told Reynolds. "I think of all those things you could have done for education, for those kids who will join gangs because you weren't there to help."

"You threw it away," he said.

Reynolds, 43, a two-term Democrat, was convicted Aug. 22 of having sex with Beverly Heard when she was 16 and 17 and obstructing the investigation of the relationship. He is appealing his conviction.

After initially complaining to police about Reynolds and telling her story to a grand jury, Heard changed her story and refused to testify against him. To compel her testimony, Suria sent her to jail for 13 days and threatened her with a term for criminal contempt.

When she finally did take the stand, she acknowledged that she had underage sexual relations with the congressman but urged the jury to be lenient.

Defense lawyers said tapes of Reynolds' phone conversations with Heard were what convinced the jury that he was guilty. On one, he asked Heard to obtain naked photos of a fictional 15-year-old who she had described as eager to have sexual relations with him.

The congressman was convicted of having sex with Heard starting in 1992 when she was 16 and continuing for more than a year. Sexual relations with a 16-year-old is illegal in Illinois. Sexual relations with a 17-year-old is legal unless the adult is in a position of authority trust or supervision.

▶ TURNPIKE TRAVELERS BEGIN USING NEW TOLL-COLLECTION SYSTEM

WICHITA (AP) — The first vehicles to use the Kansas Turnpike's new electronic toll collection system likely passed through the special toll lanes Tuesday, with more to follow starting Wednesday.

The KTA mailed out 2,500 electronic devices that allow turnpike travelers to enter and exit without stopping at a manned toll booth and should have begun arriving at customer's homes on Tuesday.

KTA president and CEO Michael Johnston said it was reasonable to assume some of those customers received their K-TAG system electronic tags Tuesday and began using them, but he had no way of knowing how many.

The customers who signed up and opened an account with the Turnpike Authority could begin using their tags immediately.

Johnston said the KTA has received 6,000 applications so far for the K-TAG devices and are receiving about 200 more each day.

"That will speed up with the publicity we're getting," he said in an interview. "It's going about as we anticipated."

Nearly 80 special lanes for the K-TAG customers at the turnpike's 20 toll plazas were operational on Tuesday.

Johnston said the system should be fully operational by sometime in November, when all customers who want the new tags have them and are using them.

Water ski team ready for meet

■ 13-member team set to compete for regional title

Phil Roberts

A big, wet test is in store for the K-State water ski team this weekend.

The team leaves Friday morning for regional competition.

"We've worked really hard," Lori Wendling, senior in pre-occupational therapy, said.

"We're probably better than we have ever been," she said.

Thirteen team members will be competing in different events, including the jump, trick and the slalom.

One student, Cory Huey, freshman in architectural engineering, passed up a full-ride scholarship to the University of Florida to pursue a degree from K-State's engineering department.

"We try to add a lot of fun to the meet and make it a relaxed atmosphere," Wendling said.

The skiers practice and perfect their skills at Stockdale Cove, a reservoir on the west side of Tuttle Creek Lake.

"Part of our team fee goes toward the use of the course and the jump ramp," Brenden Wirth, freshman undecided, said. "We get the jump ramp from the Flint Hills Ski Club."

Travis Pape, senior in milling science and management and the president of the ski team, said he expects to have a good tournament.

"Our biggest nemesis is KU, and we would like to beat them. But our main goal is to finish in the top two and qualify for nationals," Pape said.

With cold Kansas weather moving in, some changes and arrangements have to be made to get in a full day of practice.

The team tries to work around the weather, but because it is impossible to predict the weather, skiers often use alternate courses.

In addition to K-State, about 18 other teams will compete for the regional title. The team that takes the title, along with individual qualifiers, will then move in to national competition that will take place in Texas.

Although the water ski season only allows two to three meets each year, every student is encouraged to participate with the team. The team meets each Monday during the season.

"The best time to come out is early in the year," Pape said.

"That allows you to get in more practice and see where you stand on the team."

▶ AGRICULTURE

Ag career day gives students a sample of K-State life

Katie Thomas

High school students wil have an opportunity to get a first-hand look at the College of Agriculture this weekend.

"Besides information about the College of Agriculture, we try to give them information about student life at K-State," said Greg Roth, senior in agricultural economics and Agricultural Careers Day coordinator.

Agricultural Careers Day is a promotional event sponsored by the College of Agriculture's student council to show area high school students what agriculture and K-State has to offer, Roth said.

"There's a lot of career and personal development opportunities in agriculture," he said.

On Saturday, the event begins with a campus tour and general session. Students will have an opportunity to visit two departments after the session, Roth said.

"All undergraduate departments will be represented," he said.

Each department is in charge of their own presentation.

The Pre-Veterinary Medicine Club will be showing a slide show of last year's highlights, and the College of Veterinary Medicine Ambassadors will give tours of the facilities, said Lynn Kennedy, junior in animal sciences and industry and pre-veterinary medicine.

The Agriculture Education Club will talk about the opportunities available with a degree in agriculture education, Jacob Larison, senior in agriculture education, said.

Students are served lunch following the departmental visits, and they have the opportunity to purchase tickets to K-State's football game.

Talking to K-State students gives high school students a clearer picture about K-State and how it really is, Larison said.

As a high school student, there are a lot of things a person doesn't know. This gives the students a chance to be prepared for college, Kennedy said.

"We tell them what we wish we knew before we got to college," Larison said.

Week of understanding focuses on cultural harmony

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Hispanic Heritage Month kicks off with Racial Ethnic Harmony week from Oct. 1 to 6.

Dina Bennett, coordinator of multicultural student activities, said Racial Ethnic Harmony week is a time to celebrate every heritage.

"It's a week-long celebration where we celebrate the tolerance and understanding of various cultures, diversity and respect for all cultures," Bennett said.

A Community Harmony Walk will begin at 2 p.m. Oct. 1 outside of Manhattan City Hall.

The walk is to demonstrate mutual commitment and friendship among all members of K-State and the surrounding community, Bennett said.

Other events during the first part of October will weave Japanese, African-American, Jewish and Western cultures together. For the remaining three weeks, K-State will focus on a diversified Hispanic culture, including many Latin countries.

Arleen Baiges, chairwoman of Hispanic Heritage Month 1995, said many people don't realize the various types of Hispanic peoples. There are those with more European, Indian, Mexican, Spanish, Cuban, or Puerto Rican ancestry than others, she said.

"People think that because we speak Spanish and eat spicy food, we're from south of the border," Baiges said.

The focus of this month was to bring speakers, food, dance, Hispanic folklore and their ways of life to share with others. Musical presentations, art exhibits, video conferences, films, foods and more will be on hand during the month-long gala.

Bennett and Baiges said they were excited about the Gran Baile and the Salsa and Merengue dance workshop. She said all of the events are free, except for the Gran Baile and films.

The K-State Student Union will also serve Hispanic food originating from Mexico, Puerto Rico and Costa Rica Oct. 24 and 25.

This is Baiges' second year as chairwoman for the event, and she has committed herself to achieving a sense of unity among all people. In 1989, Baiges initiated Hispanic Heritage Month for K-State when she urged Mexican American Council of Students' presidents to get together and form the Hispanic American Leadership Organization.

"We want people to know what we do and who we are, not just judging us by stereotypes," Baiges said.

Baiges said HALO also has non-Hispanic members.

"I think that if you experience food, dance and music in a social gathering, you can experience anyone's culture at its fullest," Baiges said.

in our opinion

Kassebaum's student financial limitations rely on voter apathy

Voter apathy is laughing in our faces. We are advocating a multi-pronged protest.

Student aid is being funneled through the black hole of congressional budgeting, and voter apathy is grinning fiendishly.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., has proposed a bill that charges all colleges and universities for .85 percent of their federal student aid.

The bill, which passed in the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee Tuesday, is lurking on the Senate floor, and only feeble moans of protest have been heard from the victims.

The bill allows for an increase in tuition to pay for the cost, an increase in interest rates of PLUS loans, elimination of interest-free grace periods and many other alterations to student aid.

K-State, which receives more than $47 million in student aid, would be forced to pay about $382,000.

"We're just going to keep resisting this and not think about where we have to get the $300,000 to $400,000 until we have to," President Jon Wefald said Wednesday.

Well, wake up and smell the burning tax dollars. The fire is swiftly approaching the administration, students and parents. If we, the victims, do not form a game plan and protest, then who will protect us?

The federal government can't afford to pay the looming federal debt, so it is searching for way make somebody else pay.

But, like Wefald said, the money does not exist. It doesn't exist in the school's budgets, in the middle-class parent's budget and certainly not in the student's budget.

In a time of depleted government funding and increasing enrollment, colleges and universities are scrounging for money of their own, not to mention the federal government's.

If the voters' voices aren't heard, Kassebaum will succeed in giving more taxes to the hardest-taxed sector of America.

Voter apathy is laughing in our faces. We are advocating a multi-pronged protest.

The Collegian has a petition waiting for your signature at Kedzie 116.

Also, pick up a pen, sign the attached letter and send it to Sen. Kassebaum at:
SR-302 Russel Senate Office Building, Washington D.C. 20510.

Sen. Kassebaum's phone number is (202) 224-3514.

Dear Nancy Kassebaum,

Thank you for sucking the life out of our education.

The federal government has managed to slowly reduce government funding of universities and colleges during the past eight years, and now it wants a bite of our souls.

Almost 70 percent of K-State's students depend on financial aid of some kind to receive a higher education.

Adding $20 to our tuition will only discourage striving students and add debt to the pocket books of thousands of middle-income parents, which, in turn, affects the stability of America's economics.

You have asked universities to take a hard look at their own costs.

But don't forget the federal government has decreased funding and forced students to pull themselves up by their boot straps time and time again. The evidence of that pulling is seen in the increased use of federally guaranteed student loans and an increase in student tuition and fees.

As students, administrators, staff and voters, we are not asking you to reconsider your bill. We demand that you revoke it.

Find a better way to save $10.8 billion from the mandatory spending programs in the next seven years, but don't cut the lifeline of economic growth in America.

If you pawn the federal debt off on higher education, you will only find a dry well where our hearts used to beat.

Sincerely,

Parking Services hassles bikers

Once again, the twin intellectual powers on campus, Parking Services and the Parking Council, have determined doubling the cost of the meters outside the K-State Student Union was not good enough to live up to their reputation, and hence, they decided that all bikes on campus should be registered.

For those of you who are unaware of this ingenious plan, let me spell it out to you.

If you ride your bike on campus, you need to have it registered by Nov. 1. This can be done at the K-State Police Department or Parking Services. In addition, there will also be a bike fair on Oct. 6 in the free speech zone with appearances by several local bicycle vendors. There will also be two additional times to register bikes in the Union on Oct. 11 and 25.

The registration is free, and the permit you receive will be valid until Dec. 31, 1996. After that date, you must purchase another permit which should be valid for four or five years, enough time for most of us graduate. If you will be here well into the 21st century, prepare to register your bike a couple times.

Dwain Archer, director of Parking Services, said this plan is being implemented for three reasons: First, if your bicycle is stolen, police can identify it if they recover it. Second, it allows Parking Services to make a rough count of how many bikes are on campus. Third, it provides an opportunity to educate the bicyclist about safety tips and regulations.

The idea behind it is to generate revenue to pay for more bike racks, paths and other things bicyclists use.

If you decide to be less than a dutiful citizen and don't rush out to have your bike registered, you will receive a warning for the first 30-40 days after the Nov. 1 deadline. For those of you who park your bicycles illegally, in such places as handicapped spots, rails, or signposts, on trees, or an area posted as no parking, the faithful men and women of Parking Services will protect the safety of this campus and the lives of the people on it by focusing on ticketing you.

Field Impoundment, otherwise known as a wheel lock, will not be used on bicycles for lack of a decal, but rather for repeat offenders who ride on the sidewalk or park illegally.

As a public service announcement, I encourage everyone to obey the law and register your bike.

In fact, I would suggest that this is not only the most brilliant idea since wheel locks, but there is no need to stop there.

After the bicycle registration program is implemented, let's worry about the most common mode of transportation on campus: footwear.

Since the bicycle registration is designed to be able to identify stolen property, find out how many people use them, and enable parking services to ticket offenders, I believe that registering everyone's footwear should be the next step.

This way, when perpetrators do not adhere to "Keep off the Grass" signs, authorities can identify the owner of the shoe and bring that person to justice.

In addition, whenever the police recover stolen property, shoe owners can be contacted. And by knowing how many shoes are out there, it will be easier to decide which piece of sidewalk should be broken up and replaced next.

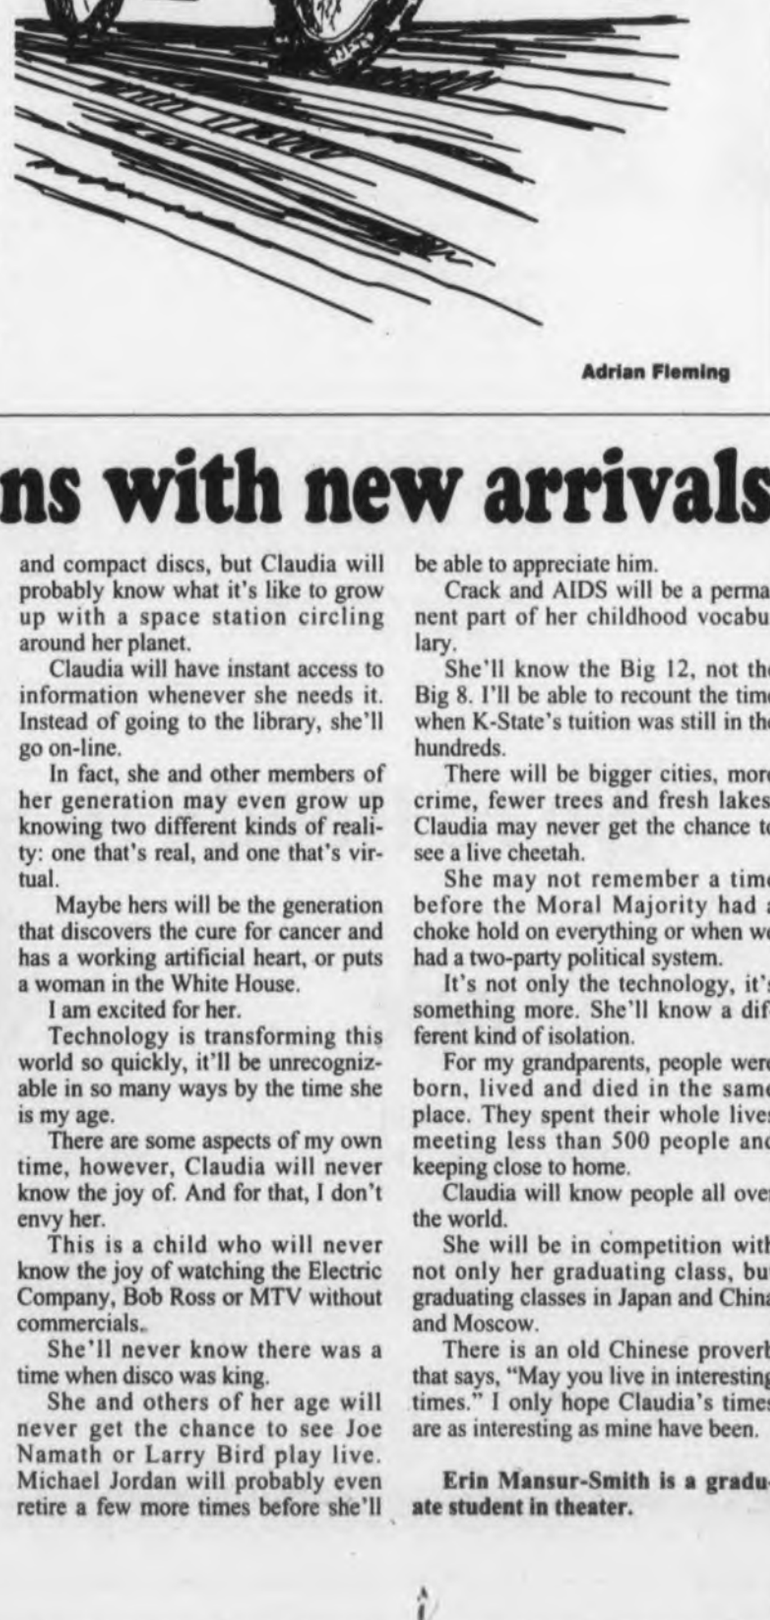
All this comes from the same people who will give you a ticket for failing to park in a stall, despite the fact that the presence of snow on the ground will cover up all traces of a line (trust me, I know).

As a thinking individual, I oppose the registration on the grounds that it is not necessary. Riding your bike to class creates the risk that it will get stolen. Because of this, locks were invented and everyone uses them to reduce that risk.

Anyone who has had their bike stolen will wish it hadn't happened, but that was part of the risk.

In addition, the police are not running out of room to store recovered bikes. It is not likely they will recover a bike if it is stolen. Hence, insurance agencies were created to protect against loss. There is no way to take risk out of life.

Keeping track of the number of bicycles on campus is a nice statistic to have, but it will not indicate how many bike racks are needed because they are needed in different places. Having 100 racks in the wrong place is worse than having no racks, because that revenue could have been used for something else.



There is no better way to allocate bike racks then to observe how many racks are needed in a certain location.

Most people who ride bicycles understand general laws of traffic and basic safety procedures. Those who ride on the sidewalk can be ticketed without needing a permit, and not many people park on handicapped rails.

Bike permits might be a good idea on paper, but they are more hassle for students to deal with, add to the cost of our user fees, and require us to reveal more to the University about ourselves than we already have.

For those of you that would like to make some kind of input about these decisions, the Bicycle Subcommittee of the Parking Council is currently looking for more members.

▶ SENATE RESPONDS

Editor,

I found the section from yesterday's Collegian very ill-conceived and poorly investigated.

If members of the Collegian had chosen to dedicate more time to this story instead of trying to create a Student Governing Association scandal, the truth could have been established for all of campus to hear, instead of relying on hearsay and rumor.

Journalistic integrity is a wonderful thing when you choose to live by it.

There is no double standard in how legislation is presented for the student body president's signature.

Over the course of Sunday and Monday, four student senators communicated to me that they wished to change their vote on Senate Bill 11.

Because people came forward to me, I did not forward Senate Bill 11 on to President Jeff Peterson in Wichita. No changes could legally be made on the final vote if it is signed.

Every piece of legislation, except Senate Bill 11, was sent to Peterson on Monday night.

If a single senator had come forward to raise a complaint on the agriculture competition teams bill, then I would have held the legislation.

There is only one policy for sending legislation to the executive branch. No double standard exists.

I hope miscommunications of this nature will not occur in the future.

When questions develop about Senate activities, I trust people will have the courtesy to get both sides of a story and not rely on gossip and hearsay.

Generation gap widens with new arrivals

My friend, Beky, gave birth on Monday to a baby girl.

Her husband, Jim, called to tell me that mother and child were doing just fine and, like every other proud papa, to describe how wonderful and special his daughter is.

Apparently, Claudia Rose Moody has her mother's yell, her father's yawn and the face of Truman Capote. She's healthy, beautiful and smart too, Jim said.

I was tempted to ask him how he could tell a blob of wriggling human flesh just three hours old was smart, but he's a new Daddy, so I didn't have the heart to tease him.

I made the cooing and congratulations sounds, which wasn't too hard because I love new babies. But when I hung up the phone, it struck me how old I really am.

I didn't mean that in an I'm-so-ancient, whining-about-my-age, kind of way. At that moment I realized how different our two lives will be. This is a child who will barely remember the century I have spent my entire life in thus far.

I have never felt a generation gap when I was the one who didn't know the latest dance steps and vocabulary and cultural icons.

Before, I would look at my parents and grandparents and kind of sneer when they described life before television.

Now, as my peers and I become parents, I feel myself becoming the one smirked at because I remember vinyl records.

I started to think about Claudia Rose and all the wonderful things she'll grow up with that I never would have imagined having. The world will be so different.

The statistics say Claudia will live longer, be healthier and probably earn more than her parents and I.

She'll be better educated and at an earlier age.

She'll probably learn how to type before she learns how to write, and she'll learn to read from a computer screen.

She'll never know life before microwaves, videocassette recorders and compact discs, but Claudia will probably know what it's like to grow up with a space station circling around her planet.

Claudia will have instant access to information whenever she needs it. Instead of going to the library, she'll go on-line.

In fact, she and other members of her generation may even grow up knowing two different kinds of reality: one that's real, and one that's virtual.

Maybe hers will be the generation that discovers the cure for cancer and has a working artificial heart, or puts a woman in the White House.

I am excited for her.

Technology is transforming this world so quickly, it'll be unrecognizable in so many ways by the time she is my age.

There are some aspects of my own time, however, Claudia will never know the joy of. And for that, I don't envy her.

This is a child who will never know the joy of watching the Electric Company, Bob Ross or MTV without commercials.

She'll never know there was a time when disco was king.

She and others of her age will never get the chance to see Joe Namath or Larry Bird play live. Michael Jordan will probably even retire a few more times before she'll be able to appreciate him.

Crack and AIDS will be a permanent part of her childhood vocabulary.

She'll know the Big 12, not the Big 8. I'll be able to recount the time when K-State's tuition was still in the hundreds.

There will be bigger cities, more crime, fewer trees and fresh lakes. Claudia may never get the chance to see a live cheetah.

She may not remember a time before the Moral Majority had a choke hold on everything or when we had a two-party political system.

It's not only the technology, it's something more. She'll know a different kind of isolation.

For my grandparents, people were born, lived and died in the same place. They spent their whole lives meeting less than 500 people and keeping close to home.

Claudia will know people all over the world.

She will be in competition with not only her graduating class, but graduating classes in Japan and China and Moscow.

There is an old Chinese proverb that says, "May you live in interesting times." I only hope Claudia's times are as interesting as mine have been.

SENATE

he could remember many votes he had cast as a member of the body that he wished he could change, but he could not.

"I still have to go home and sleep with myself at night," Henry said. "I have scarlet fever, and I'm standing in this room tonight because I was afraid these guys would lose their money."

On a vote of 14-38, the motion to allow senators to change their votes failed.

In a fourth attempt to change the votes, Jennifer Higerd, arts and sciences senator, moved to amend the minutes and allow her to change her vote. Higerd's vote was a proxy vote, and she said she wanted to vote her conscience.

On a vote of 29-20, the motion failed for a lack of a two-thirds majority.

In other business, the Legal Services Advisory Board appointments were debated twice.

The resolution was not approved because of concerns about the appointments of Mike Zamrzla, former chief of staff, as the at-large graduate member and Jenni Cheatham, chief of staff, as the at-large undergraduate members.

"I have expressed my concern about the position of the people who have been placed on this committee," Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, said.

She said she understood an at-large member on a committee should be someone not already involved in student government.

"A person from our office does not fit the requirement of an at-large member," Halinski said.

Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, said the bill was up four weeks ago, and the same students were on the bill when it was first brought up four weeks ago.

A second bill appointing the Legal Services Advisory Board members was added to the agenda. Cheatham was replaced by Shannon Unruh, freshman in arts and sciences undecided. Potter called Unruh and asked him to be on the committee. The resolution passed on a voice vote.

Although objections had been raised to the appointment of the chief of staff as an at-large member before Thursday, Potter said he did not want to change the name of the appointment after the executive meeting Tuesday night.

He said he was reluctant to make a last-minute change because people had objected to last-minute changes to previous appointment bills.

In other business, Renee Fisher, arts and sciences senator, resigned her position, citing ethical concerns.

The other appointment was the replacement of an engineering senator. Jeff Dougan, junior in mechanical engineering, was approved and sworn in.

In second readings, the priority list for the City/University Projects Fund passed.

The projects included more lighting, crosswalks, the escort service, Aggieville plaza, a project connecting the Manhattan Public and Farrell libraries and bike paths.

A resolution supporting the appointment of a student to the Kansas Board of Regents also passed.

Three allocations bills also passed.

- The first bill gave more advertising money to student groups to allow for changes in advertising rates.
- The second bill was the informal allocations guidelines for 1995-96.
- The third bill was a $69 special allocation for the Pakistani Student Organization for an Independence Day celebration.

The final bill voted on was the number of mandatory meetings for the Holton Hall Advisory Board. The number of meetings was changed from the three proposed in the appointment legislation to two meetings each semester.

Up for first readings was an allocation of $5,000 to Speech Unlimited.

The allocation will leave about $1,200 in the account for academic competition teams, Avila said.

Jeff Sweat, arts and sciences senator, asked to speak twice during open period. The second time he asked to speak, he said he wanted to speak about ethical concerns.

Henry moved to call for a 45-minute executive session, but the motion was withdrawn because the discussion would have been about elected personnel, which is in violation of the Kansas Open Meetings Laws.

A roll call was taken, and it was found Senate no longer had a quorum, so it adjourned. Those senators not in attendance received one-third of an absence.

BOMB

they notified the building managers and evacuated the buildings, then searched them for anything suspicious, he said.

"Nothing was located," he said.

At this time, campus police said they believe this threat came from someone who was trying to get out of a test.

"We will look at class schedules, talk with instructors and witnesses and see if anything sticks out or if there is anything we should be aware of," he said.

K-State takes each bomb threat seriously, he said.

"Especially with regards to what happened in Oklahoma City. We do not take this lightly," he said.

In regards to Thursday's events, there was no reason to contact the FBI or the KBI, Mellgren said.

"If some type of explosive device would have been found, then we would have called," he said.

Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said he received a telephone call at 11:10 a.m. from the police who said there had been a bomb threat.

"It was quite a shock. It is a criminal act that cause numerous confusion," he said.

With the attack in Oklahoma City, this brings about a lot of serious concern, he said.

"It was the first test of the semester in my American women writers class. One of the suits came in and said we had to leave because there was a bomb threat," Jared Becker, junior in English literature, said.

"When we got outside, my professor was yelling because we had to finish our test," he said.

Heather Bradley, sophomore in psychology and social work, said it was 11:15 a.m. and she was going to her sociology class when a man came to the front of the room.

"He said, 'Hello. There has been a bomb threat, everyone must evacuate,'" she said.

Russ Gibson, sophomore in anthropology and secondary education, said he was upset because they only were out about 30 feet from Denison and that they still were continuing class.

"What would have happened if there would have been a real bomb or if it would have went off?" he said.

Amy Lagrone, junior in public relations and theater, said she was driving up to the Union thinking she would get a really good parking spot. When she pulled in, a woman with a walkie-talkie said there had been a bomb threat.

"I did get a good parking spot, but I then realized if the Union blows up so does my car," she said.

Kay Farley, K-State Student Union Bookstore manager, said the employees remained calm and this helped to keep the customers calm.

"The store was really busy, yet it only took us two minutes to get everyone out," she said.

Farley said in the past campus police had students just leave the building and go outside, yet yesterday they made them go way back, just in case there was flying debris.

K-State was host to a conference yesterday with more than 350 people attending, plus there were the regular patrons and the employees. This was very serious, she said.

"We could have equally surpassed the death toll in Oklahoma City with just who was in the Union. This could have been a serious disaster," Farley said.

Laurie Hovell, senior in mass communications and Union Bookstore employee, said she is thankful that K-State Police take threats like this very seriously.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, said the people who perpetrate these hoaxes do not understand the effects this has on the campus.

"Many students are negatively impacted because one can never tell when it is a hoax," she said.

William Kennedy Jr., Riley County Attorney, said this was a class-E, level-9, personal felony or a criminal threat.

In statue KS 21-4704, Kansas defines criminal threat as the threat to commit violence, communicated with the intent to terrorize or cause the evacuation of a building with the disregard of risk of causing terror, Kennedy said.

"Depending on past criminal history of the accused, they could get five to 17 months in prison," he said.

At this time there are no suspects, Mellgren said.

"If anyone has information, they need to call either Riley County Crime Stoppers, which is an anonymous phone call, or they can call K-State Police," he said.

"We would appreciate any help from anybody with knowledge with what took place," he said.

LAFENE

SHAC met Thursday morning and decided to have a survey that will be conducted the first week of October. It will ask questions about user fees, insurance and fee plans.

SHAC hopes to have its recommendation finished by mid-October.

"We don't want a user fee," Tricia McKale, SHAC co-chairwoman, said. "We think that Lafene benefits the whole campus."

Not only is Lafene fighting to keep its fee at its current level or even raise it to a higher level, it is also fighting a budget crunch. Two years ago, the Lafene fee was cut from $80 to $70 per semester for full-time students because student senators said Lafene had too much money in reserves.

Student Senate told Lafene to get rid of the reserves it had built up and cut the health fee.

Although Lafene has enough money to stay open and keep running at current levels for now, reserve funds will run out in June. Lafene must come up with ways to cut costs and look for duplicate services to cut in order to survive, Zweimiller said.

OSU meet an important yardstick for K-State runners

staff writer

Because of the quality of the competition, K-State cross country coach Terry Drake said Saturday's OSU Cowboy Jamboree is perfect for both Wildcat teams.

"This is a perfect meet for both our men's and women's squads right now, because it will provide good competition, but not overwhelming competition," Drake said.

"We still have the opportunity to run against good people, as well as have the opportunity to win."

On the men's side, Arkansas is ranked fourth in the nation, Oklahoma State is 10th, and Baylor has received votes in the poll all year long. Even though K-State blitzed KU 58-138 two weeks ago, the Cats remain out of the poll, while KU is still ranked.

"Actually, I thought we'd be 24th or 25th. And for them (KU) to stay ranked for how bad we beat them, it's a surprise," Drake said.

"But we've been down for a couple years, and it's hard to get back in after you've been out for a couple of seasons."

If the K-State men perform well Saturday, Drake said, they could jump into the rankings.

"I don't know how we could be ignored if we beat Baylor and get close to OSU and Arkansas," Drake said.

By resting his top-nine runners in last weekend's KSU Invitational, Drake will have fresh troops Saturday. Drake said he also didn't run the troops as much in preparation for Saturday.

"We cut back a little bit this week, so we'll be a little fresher than we would've been," Drake said.

John Thorpe, David Domingues, Ryan Clive-Smith, Paul Birnbaum, Brent Stover, Zach Davies, Dave Barland, John Etzel and Brian Coiner will run for the Cats.

Drake said the meet is important because of Arkansas and OSU will be running.

"Two of the top five schools in the country are OSU and Arkansas, and they're both going to be there, so it gives our men a chance to run against the best," Drake said.

"We need to run against those schools right now."

A satisfactory finish for K-State, Drake said, would be third ahead of Baylor and close to OSU and Arkansas.

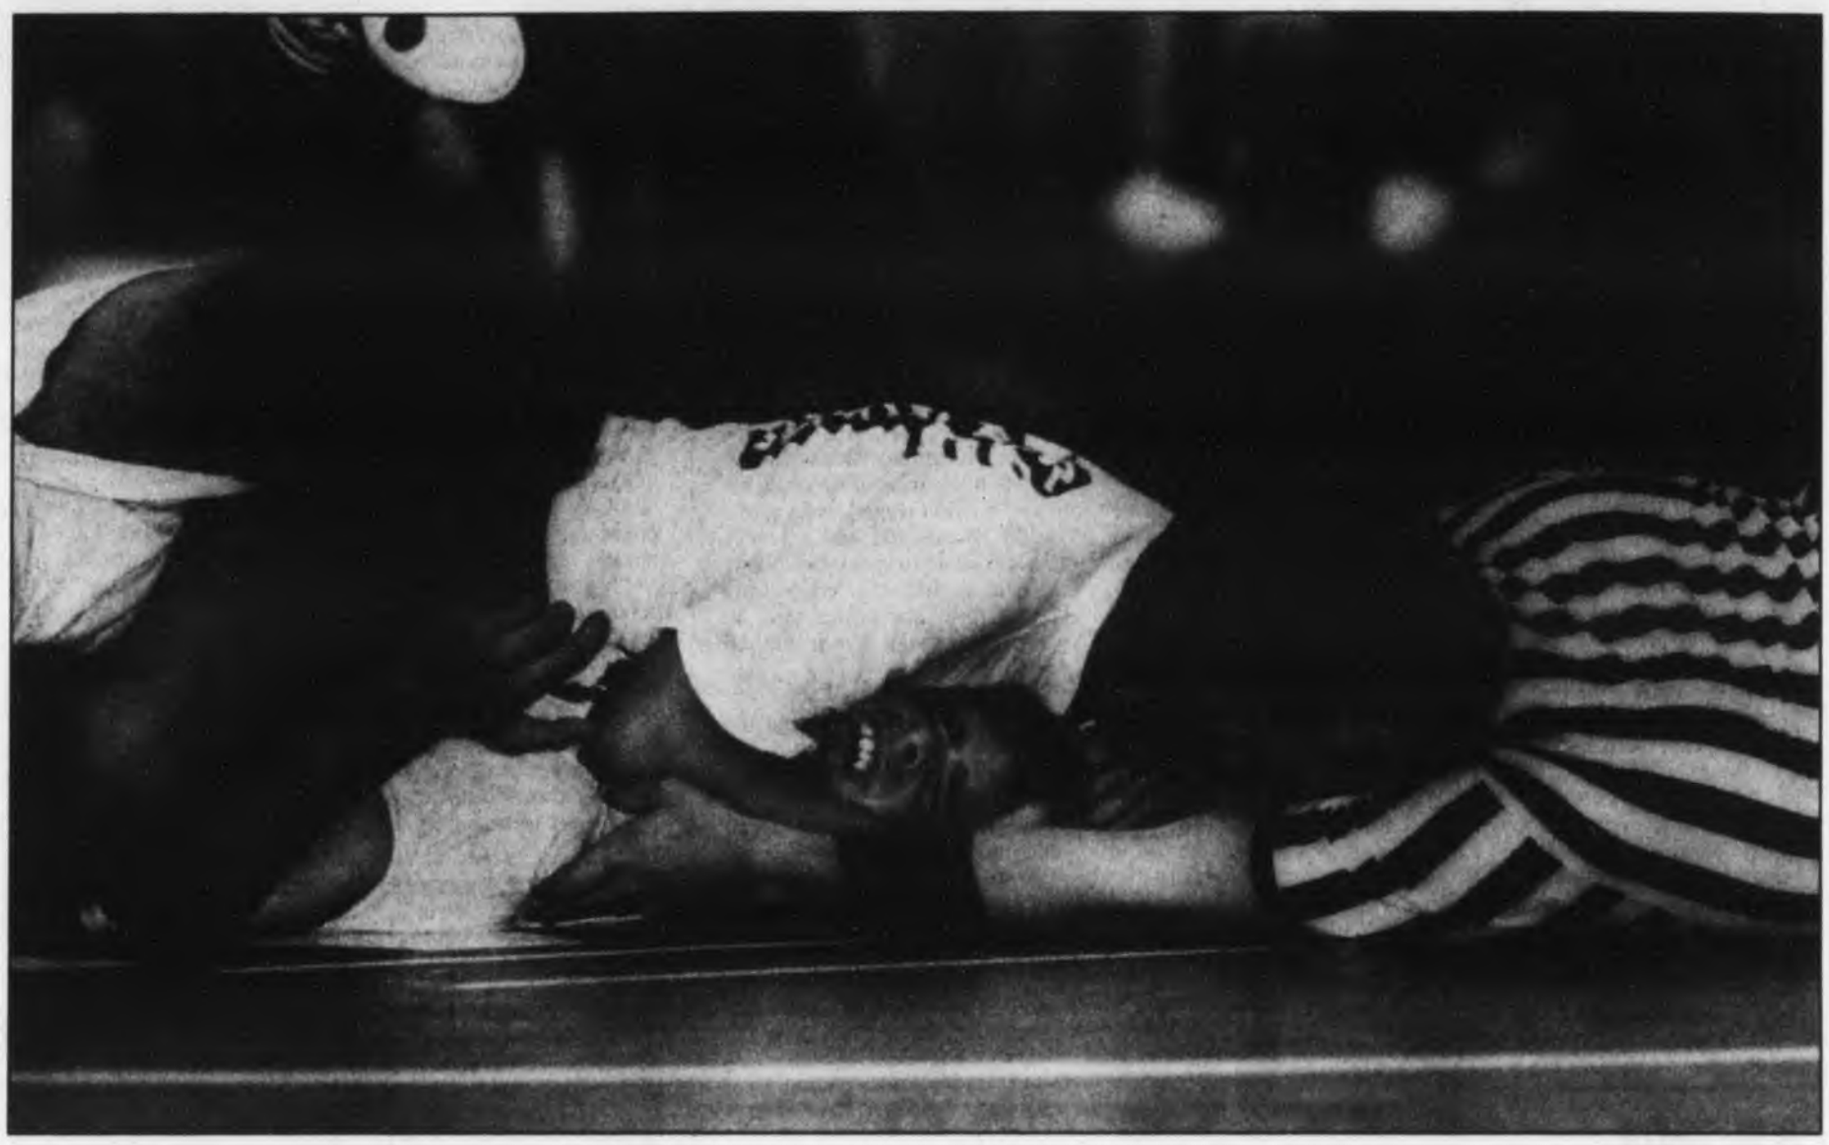
> K-STATE CROSS COUNTRY COACH

"If we get third, but we're not close to OSU and Arkansas, I'll be disappointed," Drake said. "We need to get close to those two and beat one of them."

On the women's side, K-State will be less than 100 percent with sophomore Charity Swartz out with a sinus infection. Drake said Swartz will travel with the team in order to see the course — the same course K-State will run at the district race later in the season.

K-State will be led by Irma Betancourt, Cristy Swartz and Samantha McNamara.



"It's going to be a good meet for the women," Drake said.

"We're a little beat up, but everybody's running well."

Although it's an important meet, Drake said the absence of Arkansas on the women's side provides less competition for the women.

"It won't be as overwhelming as the men's race, but it's definitely a meet we need to go and try to win," Drake said.

After Saturday's meet, K-State will have next weekend off before traveling to Ames, Iowa for the NCAA Pre-Meet Oct. 14.

Cats' defense to be tested against NIU

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Final exams aren't for another 12 weeks, but for the K-State defense, the test starts this weekend.

When Northern Illinois comes into town tomorrow (1:10 at KSU Stadium), it'll bring a huge offensive line, an excellent running back and a solid passing attack.

The K-State defense ranks high in every key category but readily acknowledges it hasn't faced a balanced offense yet.

"I don't think we've been tested yet," Coach Bill Snyder said. "I think each week now, it gets a little tougher and certainly, Northern Illinois is a good running football team, so that will begin the test."

And it's not only Snyder who realizes Northern Illinois (2-2) is no Akron.

"This week is a tough test," defensive end Nyle Wiren said. "They have some big guys, and that's what they do, is run. So it'll be a test for us."

Snyder said the defense needs to improve its performance against the run, even though it ranks third in the nation and second in the conference, giving up a mere 67.3 yards a game.

But it's the 5-to-7 yard runs Wiren said the Wildcats need to eliminate.

"We've been giving up small things, and we need to just totally shut people down," Wiren said.

As ABC's Keith Jackson says, Northern Illinois has got a bunch of "big uglies." On the line, the Huskies have three players weighing more than 300 pounds, with the other two weighing 290 and 278.

So far this season, the line has opened holes for Charles Talley, who has already run for 505 yards and is averaging 4.1 yards per carry.

"They're big and physical," Snyder said.

"Nebraska always has a well-sized offensive line, and most teams today in college football are big offensively, but it certainly seems they are the biggest we've faced so far."

The Huskies, who beat Southwestern Louisiana 25-24 last week when Coach Charlie Sadler went for two points with 17 seconds to go, implement a lot of pre-snap motion to create running room for Talley.

"They utilize their personnel well," Snyder said. "They try to create additional gaps by utilizing a great deal of motion similar to Boston College and several professional teams to enhance their running game. Anytime you put an additional man on the line of scrimmage, you've created an additional gap the defense has to secure."

But the Huskies do throw the ball, averaging 182 yards a game through the air. Quarterback Aaron Gilbert, even though he has completed only 43 percent of his passes, has 731 yards throwing and eight touchdowns.

"In addition to having big guys up there who can knock people around and a good running back, their schemes play to their personnel," Snyder said. "If you look at what he (Gilbert) has completed, his yards per attempt and yards per completion are substantial.

"When you watch them on film, you see that they throw the ball downfield a lot, and they don't do a lot of possession pass offense."

In his first four games, Gilbert has completed passes of 50, 49 and 48 yards. Wide receiver Ralph Strickland has caught 17 balls for 302 yards and three touchdowns this season.

With several talented players and a mammoth offensive line, the Huskies might be able to put some sustained drives together against K-State, something Temple, Cincinnati and Akron didn't accomplish.

"That's a hard thing to do against us," Snyder said. "Just the nature of our defense makes it difficult to sustain drives."

With conference play starting next week against Missouri, the eight-week exam starts tomorrow, and Wiren said the defense is ready.

"We're just a sound defense," Wiren said.

"We'll see how everything turns out."

Snyder to break record

With a win over Northern Illinois tomorrow, Coach Bill Snyder will become the winningest coach in K-State history, passing Mike Ahearn, who won 39 games between 1905 and 1910.

Snyder was asked about the record at Tuesday's news conference.

"I honestly do not think about it and haven't given much thought to it," Snyder said. "I don't think it's a tremendously significant achievement by any stretch of the imagination. There's a lot of coaches around the country who have won a heckuva lot more ball games and have a heckuva lot better winning percentage."

But Snyder said there is a positive involved.

"If there is anything positive attached to it, which there is, I don't want to downplay it that much, but it's a testimony that says there are a lot of good people that have really helped this program."

Snyder, in his seventh season, is 39-31-1 at K-State.

NCAA

▶ PRESIDENTS VOTE TO DELAY PLAY OF JUNIOR-COLLEGE TRANSFERS

OVERLAND PARK — The NCAA Presidents Commission has agreed to support a requirement that football and men's basketball players who transfer from two-year colleges sit out one year before playing at NCAA Division I colleges.

NCAA members will vote on the proposed rule at their convention in January, the National Collegiate Athletic Association announced Thursday.

The NCAA Council proposed the change because of concerns about low graduation rates for transfer students in those two sports.

The latest graduation rate for two-year transfers in men's basketball was 38 percent, compared to 44 percent for those who entered a four-year school as freshmen.

The rates for football were 40 percent for transfers and 51 percent for those who entered as freshmen.

The Presidents Commission, which met in Denver, also agreed to suggest an amendment to exempt two-year transfers who have completed 40 percent of the requirements for the bachelor's degree program they have entered.

The commission voted to oppose proposals to change the restricted earnings coach position. Because of a lawsuit, that position is no longer restricted in earnings.

The proposals would change the position to a part-time or graduate assistant position.

Cats come together to top Valparaiso

Shana Newell
staff writer

K-State's volleyball team will most assuredly not be boasting about its latest win en route to a 13-2 record.

An hour and 55 minutes after game time, the team emerged with its 13th victory, defeating Valparaiso Thursday night at Ahearn Fieldhouse. But it did not happen without some ups and downs.

Although the Wildcats won the first game of the evening 15-5, they allowed the Crusaders to defeat them 19-17 in the second game. Fortunately for K-State, the team was able to pull itself together.

It was long struggle toward victory as the team barely defeated Valparaiso 15-12 in the third game.

Thanks to a tiring Crusader squad and a higher intensity level on the court, K-State finished the match quickly. It dominated the fourth game and allowed Valparaiso to score a mere three points.

The Cats were ahead 14-5 and only needed game point to shut the Crusaders down.

"By any stretch of the imagination, nobody played their best defensively," Moore said.

The K-State defense fell apart completely, allowing Valparaiso to battle back to tie the game at 14.

From that point in the match, the Cats were unable to pull ahead of Valparaiso, and possession went back and forth between the two teams. Eventually, Valparaiso was able to hold on and win as the physically and mentally exhausted K-State team slipped.

"We completely let down. We don't close out our games, and that's going to cost us," Moore said.

While it did cost the Cats one game in a match that eventually belonged to them, it might have paid off in the long run.

"We had a little lapse there, but we learned a lesson. Something that Jim has been trying to tell us the whole season," K-State's Yolanda "Toie" Young said. "I think for the first time I finally saw it myself, and I'm pretty sure a lot of the teammates saw it, too. It was a big lesson learned."

That learned lesson came during the break after the second match for K-State's play-set-hitter, and Young thinks the rest of her teammates picked it up too, she said.

"For the first time, nothing needed to be said [in the locker room] because we all understood," Young said. "For the first time, we all saw what Jim was seeing, so we just acknowledged that, and we went on from there."

Moore did not have anything to say to the team in the locker room.

"I walked in there and said, 'You can't do that,' and walked out," he said.

However disappointed Moore was with the overall team performance, he said he was impressed with how well Young competed.

"I thought Toie hit the ball real well tonight. I'm real happy with the way Toie is playing right now," Moore said. "She's stepping up when she needs to. And when we started struggling, she stepped up."

Young ran the show Tuesday night for the Cats, hitting an even .500. She recorded 23 kills, 38 total attacks, five digs and two service aces.

"She knew it was going to have to be her to put the ball on the floor, and she did," Moore said. "It's been Katie all year long in that role, and Toie's going to have to take that role sometime, too. We need more than one person who can do that."

Middle blocker Kate DeClerk also played well tonight, hitting at .643. She had 19 kills, 28 total attacks and one service ace.

"Kate's played a lot lot better. It's really hard to say a lot of positive things when that's the thing that's keeping us from being a good team," Moore said. "We've been talking about it for the last two or three weeks, and we're a long ways away from being a good team."

Defensively, hitter Kim Zschau led the team with 18 digs, two solo blocks and three block assists. Had she not made seven errors, Zschau would have had an impressive attack percentage with 19 kills and 43 total attack.

Asked how the Cats can improve before Saturday, Moore said it will be up to the girls themselves.

"It's too late now. We've got one day of practice before Saturday. They either do it or they don't," he said. "You're not going to fix anything in one practice. I don't believe in that at all."

"You can do some things to prepare more for them and do some different things, but that's all we can do now. It's almost too late now."

To prepare themselves for Saturday night's match with 16th-ranked Colorado, Moore said the team must keep a high intensity level and work on a new attitude.

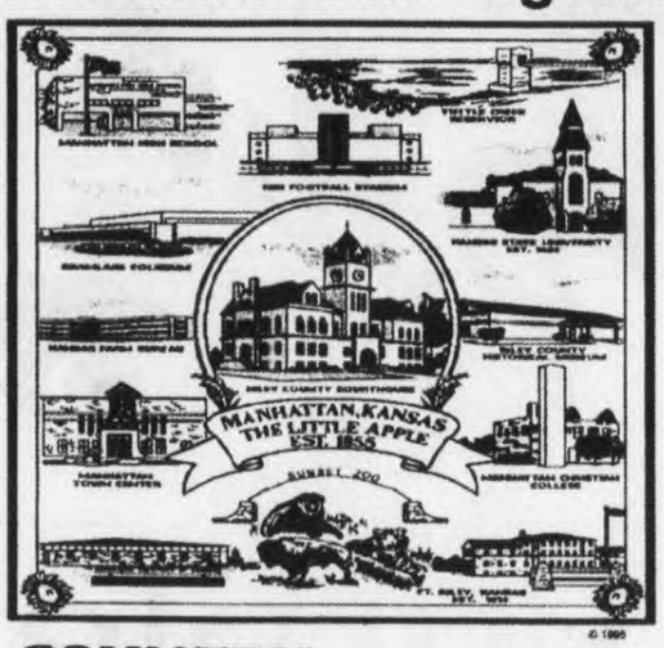
"The willingness to force yourself to stay focused and to push and to struggle and to fight and to out-work the other team, that's all those cliches, all those things at a time," he said. "We're not doing it, and we need to do it. It's the feeling, and it's something they have to do, and nobody can help them."

Moore said he is not looking forward to the match against the Buffaloes, and he is pretty certain the team feels the same way.

"I don't think they would be right now. I know I'm not," he said.

"We're never, ever going to beat a Colorado or a Nebraska until we close out games and matches. Until we learn to close them out, somebody will always come back and beat us."

"It's a big game. I'm anxious," Young said about the Colorado match. "Today's game put it more in perspective for me, because before I was really anxious."



"Seeing what Jim has been saying for this whole season, seeing it for myself, it makes me nervous, because now I know what we're doing, and I've got to work hard to not let it happen again."

Weekend festivities a year in the works

Jeremy Crabtree
staff reporter

Making weekend plans doesn't usually take an entire year.

However, Becky Klingler and the others involved with the planning of K-State's Family Weekend, spent a year making this weekend a success..

"We've really been planning this from this time last year," said Klingler, director of constituent programs for the KSU Alumni Association and organizer Family Weekend.

"Following Family Weekend we will get evaluations from families, and we start to see what they liked. That's really the springboard for what we do," she said.

With help from the Family Weekend Committee, planning this year's weekend has been easier than in the past.

"We have it down to a system," Klingler said. "We try to do as much as we can before the actual event. There are some things that you can't do until the last minute. So, there are a few things that we have to do in a time crunch."

Even though the committee has the planning down to a system, there are a lot of small uncontrollable things people get upset about, she said.

"Probably the most difficult thing about this is trying to make everyone happy," Klingler said. "There's a lot of things that we'll look at in the evaluations, like that people complain about the weather. There's not a lot we can do to ensure sunshine."

Even with the complaints, she said it is important for families to have fun this weekend.

"A lot of people have unique requests, and we try to accommodate them as much as we can," Klingler said.

"We want everyone to be happy and have a great time."

▶ K-STATE-SALINA

K-State-Salina set for family weekend activities

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

K-State-Salina is getting into the action.

"This is really the first year we started pushing student activities," Jim Russell, director of college advancement, said.

K-State-Salina has a full weekend of activities planned for Family Weekend.

The events start with registration at 8 a.m. in the College Center. At 9 a.m., there will be a campus tour. Between 9 and 11 a.m., the cookie cook-off award will be presented, and there will be a reception with Dean Jack Henry, Russell said.

The cookie cook-off is a family contest. A dozen tried and true cookies are sampled and judged, Russell said.

At 11:15 a.m., a bus will leave for the football game in Manhattan.

For those staying in Salina, a lunch will be served from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. At 5 p.m., a dinner will be served, and at 7 p.m., there will be a free concert.

The concert will feature Acafellas, a men's a cappella group from Chicago, Russell said.

The Family Weekend activities will end with a brunch from 10:30 a.m. to noon Sunday, Russell said.

Parents of K-State-Salina students were encouraged to participate in the weekend's activities through telephone calls earlier this week, Russell said.

Due to an increase in student enrollment, a large turnout for the weekend is expected, Russell said.

Campus visitors will be welcomed by halls

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

K-State's resident halls have shifted gears this Family Weekend.

The residence halls are not providing many activities in for Family Weekend because they don't want to interfere with the University's plans for Family Weekend, said Eric Keen, junior in mechanical engineering and president of the Association of Residence Halls.

Instead, the halls will provide hot cocoa, juice and doughnuts for parents and siblings.

"There are so many things that are going on, and it will be hard for families to be running here and there," Keen said. "The halls are more like a place for the them to rest."

In addition to snacks, hall tours will also be given to interested family members, he said.

In the past, residence halls have participated in a Home Sweet Home contest. For the contest, residents in each halls brought in family recipes that were made into a book and sold to residents.

"This year, we stopped because of a lack of funds, and it was a lot of work collecting the recipes," Keen said.

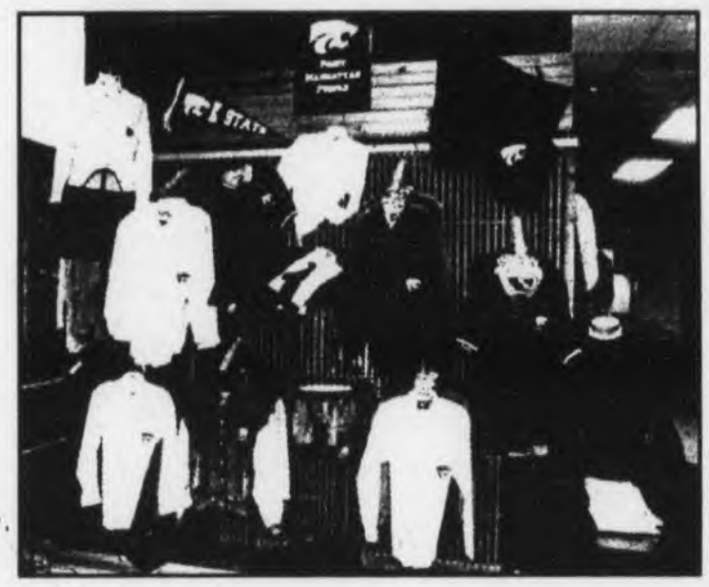
Smurthwaite House, a cooperative scholarship house, is having a brunch for its residents and their families, Jill Hayhurst, sophomore in speech pathology and president, said.

"This is our first family event that we all get a chance to be together," Hayhurst said. "This event will give all the families a chance to get to know each other."

The women of Smurthwaite and their families also plan to attend the game together Saturday.

Derby and Kramer food centers are having a Family Foodfest for residents and their families, Mary Lotridge, administrative dietitian in Kramer, said.

Some of the foods featured will include deli meats, cheeses, hot wings, mozzarella sticks and monster cookies.



"The entire meal will be served in the dining room as a buffet from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Saturday," Lotridge said.

Honorary recognizes Wichita family

Becky Klenklen
staff reporter

Amazed and dumbfounded.

That was the response Jean Eby said she had after learning Charles, her husband, and her were selected as K-State's honorary family by the Chimes Junior Honorary.

The Ebys were nominated by their youngest daughter, Susan Eby.

"I thought this would be a great way to honor them as K-State graduates and the rest of the 18 of 22 people in my family who have gone to K-State," said Susan Eby, junior in secondary education, said.

"I was really irritated at Susan when she didn't come home for Labor Day. She said she had to work. It's OK now; she worked on this," Jean Eby, Wichita resident, said.

Susan Eby stayed at K-State during Labor Day weekend and worked on the essay. She got the idea from her friend, Justin Kastner, whose family won last year's competition, Susan Eby said.

The Ebys' other daughter, Christina Neely, graduated from K-State in May and was married this summer.

The Ebys were also host to a Swedish exchange student in 1989, Ingrid Hedstrom. Hedstrom is now working on her master's thesis in agronomy from a Swedish university.

"She loves K-State and probably would've attended there if it could have worked out," Jean Eby said.

The contestants were nominated by writing an essay about their family. The essay had to be 500 to 1,000 words. The writers described the family's connection to the student, their involvement with the community and to the student, and how they have contributed to the higher education process at K-State, said Emily Simpson, junior in music education and programming chairman of Chimes.

Chimes programming committee narrowed the essays down to three finalists. The committee then read the selected essays to the Chimes members. The members then selected a finalist family and an honorary family.

"I'd like to thank Chimes. My most enjoyable memories of K-State was being in Sparks, Chimes and Mortar Board. Thanks also to the University and alumni supporters," Jean Eby said.

The finalist family won tickets to the Family Weekend football game. They are invited to the Chimes banquet before the football game, and presented with a certificate.

During halftime, they are presented a plaque by Simpson, Toby Rush, Chimes president, and Patty Clark, K-State Alumni Association chairman of the board of directors, on the football field.

The Ebys will also receive a free two-night stay at the Ramada Inn, an invitation to the Chimes banquet, a ticket to the K-State Family Banquet after the game in the K-State Student Union and a ticket to the comedy performance in McCain Auditorium, Simpson said.

As for plans this Family Weekend, the Ebys will attend the Treasures of the Czars exhibit in Topeka Friday afternoon. They are also taking their family out for dinner. Saturday, they plan on enjoying all the preparations made for them and stopping at the Kappa Alpha Theta house for a reception, Jean Eby said.

Chimes elected three chairs for Family Weekend.

Simpson was elected programing chairman of Chimes. Her duties have included publicizing the application process and notifying the nominated families.

"It has been really neat, and I feel very fortunate to get to have this position," Simpson said.

Chad Long, junior in biology and pre-med, was also elected as the community publicity and fund-raising chairman. His duties have included raising funds from local businesses.

He then distributed posters to recognize those sponsoring Family Weekend.

"I've thoroughly enjoyed working with the Manhattan businesses," Long said.

"They've shown great support for K-State, especially in regards to the 1995 Family Weekend. It is because of their eager willingness to help, I am sure Family Weekend will be a positive experience to everyone involved."

Brad Parker, junior in agriculture journalism, was elected as Union programming chairman. He is in charge of the Chimes banquet before the game.

"Chimes has been giving this honor since the 1970s," said Richard P. Coleman, professor of marketing and adviser of Chimes.

The contest began in the 1960s and was called "The Family of the Year."

It also took place during halftime of a football game. Students could nominate their parents by placing their name in a jar. A name was then drawn and that family won, Coleman said.

Chimes is based on service, leadership and scholarship. It sponsors Family Weekend with the Alumni Association and the Family Programming Committee.

Use of antibiotics cautioned

Associated Press

ATLANTA — The government warned hospitals and doctors Thursday to use antibiotics more sparingly to slow the development of germs impervious to anything medicine can hurl at them.

The overuse of antibiotics has been blamed for the dangerous proliferation of drug-resistant strains of bacteria.

Antibiotics kill weak bacteria and leave the strongest to reproduce.

"This is a national problem, a significant crisis," said Dr. Walter Hierholzer of Yale-New Haven Hospital, chairman of the government advisory committee that developed the recommendations.

The guidelines from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention focus on hospitals, where patients are most likely to catch the superbugs.

One of the most powerful is a type of enterococci that is resistant even to vancomycin, the antibiotic of last resort.

The guidelines:

■ Hospital labs should periodically test patients for vancomycin-resistant enterococci, or VRE.

■ Hospitals should isolate VRE-infected patients and make health care workers who treat them wear protective clothing.

■ Hospitals should improve simple housekeeping because VRE can live on dirty telephones, walls and patient charts.

■ Doctors shouldn't prescribe antibiotics for viral illnesses, such as colds, because antibiotics work only against bacteria.

■ Doctors shouldn't prescribe antibiotics in low doses or for just a few days.

Weak prescriptions merely slow down the bugs and help create superbugs.

Without such precautions, vancomycin, which has been on the market since the 1960s, may soon become almost useless, Hierholzer said.

He also said patients should question doctors about whether antibiotic prescriptions are necessary.

"What they shouldn't say is, 'How about giving me some antibiotics?' or go doctor-shopping to get drugs that won't work," he said.

Infectious-disease specialists welcomed the guidelines as a first step but said more research is needed into how bacteria become drug-resistant.

At the University of Virginia Health Sciences Center, where doctors already must limit prescriptions of vancomycin, epidemiologist Barry Farr said, "We're in for a long war."

▶ BAND DAY

Bands from across the state to converge for parade, game

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Twirling batons, brassy trumpets, waving flags and football.

It all comes together this weekend when more than 40 bands from across the state come to Manhattan for Band Day festivities.

The day's events kick off at 9 a.m. in City Park, when nearly 3,000 high school musicians, flag and color guard corps, baton twirlers and drum majors march in a parade down Poyntz Avenue.

Frank Tracz, director of the K-State Marching Band, said the community response to the parade is always positive.

"Poyntz Avenue is a nice place to have a parade. There are stores and restaurants, and the length is perfect," he said.

After the parade, students will load onto buses outside the Manhattan Town Center and go to KSU Stadium where they will have a 45-minute rehearsal for the halftime show, he said.

The high school musicians and the K-State Marching Band will perform "Colors of the Wind" from "Pocahontas," as well as traditional Band Day favorites like "Wildcat Victory" and the finale to Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture."

Fort Riley will also participate in the festivities at halftime.

The 1st Battalion, 5th Field Artillery Unit will use six 105 millimeter Howitzers to blast the finale of the "1812 Overture," said Deb Skidmore, public affairs director at Fort Riley.

A Howitzer is something like a small cannon.

Preparation to make Band Day a success has taken more than a month, and doing all the paperwork is what really takes up the most time, Tracz said.

"It never ends," he said. "It's a major production, but we're glad to do it."

The K-State band members will also be hard at work to ensure Band Day goes smoothly. Members will serve as guides and chaperones to the high school students and help students do what they are supposed to be doing, he said.

"They answer everything from how to act, what to wear and where to go for questions," Tracz said.

The visiting band members will have a chance to win prizes and band scholarships during Band Day.

"All of the band members will fill out information cards in the morning. We will be at the game to draw for three $150 scholarships and other K-State memorabilia donated from the community," Paula Ansay, K-State admissions representative, said.

The scholarships are only for seniors who plan to attend K-State next year, she said.

The K-State Marching Band takes advantage of the large number of high school band students on campus during Band Day to do recruiting.

"We work with admissions to get recruiting information," Tracz said. "We get everything out of it we can."

The Manhattan High School Marching Band is one of the many high schools participating in this year's Band Day.

Joel Gittle, assistant director of bands at MHS, said his students enjoy participating in Band Day because they get to perform, and they get a free ticket to see the game.

▶ SUNSET ZOOLOGICAL PARK

Music festival to include rodeo, dance

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Slip on your boots, kick up your heels and head for the zoo for some western tunes and wild times at Sunset Zoological Park's third-annual Country Music Festival.

From noon to 4 p.m. Sunday, the public is welcome to hear Jennie Raynor and Hard to Handle perform at the Sunset Zoo pavilion. Country festivities include two-step dance lessons, a children's rodeo and a live animal program.

Angie Fenstermacher, Sunset Zoo's marketing and development director, said the zoo wanted to promote something that would tie in with Family Weekend and National Arts and Humanities month.

"We try to keep family in mind and thought it would be fun to have a rodeo," Fenstermacher said. "And that is kind of where the country music fits in."

Festivities take place at different times throughout the day, and the KSU Rodeo Club will be there.

Miss Rodeo K-State, Lena Ratliff, will be at the Sunset Zoo supporting the club and signing autographs for the crowd.

Ratliff, junior in animal science, said the club will have a presentation at 12:30 p.m. to introduce itself to the community, talk about the club and announce upcoming events.

"We'd just like to get out there and tell them about rodeo. A lot of people don't know about the K-State rodeo club team and rodeo," Ratliff said.

She said the club will spend the four-hour day with the little westerners at the children's rodeo. There, the children can rope a dummy steer and pretend to barrel race around 5-gallon buckets on stick horses.

Fenstermacher said the first 100 children to enter the gates will receive a free cowboy hat.

Two-step dance lessons will be taught by Ron and Catherine Dunn at 2:30 p.m. in the pavilion.

The Wildlife Theater will feature two live-animal programs at 2 and 4:30 p.m., where patrons can tour the zoo and learn about its animals and their environments.

Fenstermacher said some of the touchable animals range from snakes and birds, to skinks and giant kissing cockroaches.

Concession stands will be open Sunday, but patrons should take heed to the wild animals' strict diets.

"We hope they'll buy hot dogs and feed themselves and not the animals," Fenstermacher said.

If you enjoyed 'Pulp Fiction,' go see 'Seven'

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Prepare to be disturbed. Prepare to be jolted from your seat, thrust back in horror and finally numbed. With "Seven," prepare for a movie that crosses the line of decency.

The reckless, jagged introduction sets the pace for a movie where the frame of each scene overshadows the content.

The desensitization begins with constant drenching rain and the blanket moodiness surrounding a gritty metro police station in New York City.

Humanity makes brief appearances in the tender relationships born between the brilliantly selected cast.

Detective William Sommerset, played by Morgan Freeman, prepares to close his 34 years of police work after seven days with the newly transferred Detective David Mills, played by Brad Pitt.

The strength of the film is in pairing the seasoned, sage and freckled Freeman with the silver-tongued punk Pitt who writhes about in his unearned arrogance.

Mixing images of Serpico with Barney Fife, Pitt strikes the notes of his character most effectively when sharing a scene with his wife Tracy. Gwenyth Paltrow, a classically beautiful newcomer, adds refreshing honesty and complexity to the thankless role of playing a cop's wife.

The language is blunt and confrontational but not smart enough to evoke the intended bite.

The medieval sermon of murders from a methodical Messianic madman unfolds like a plunge into the depths of Dante's "Inferno."

At one point, disturbed Jonathon Doe (Kevin Spacey) preaches that to gain the strict attention of the world, one must aim to shock. Taking that advice, "Seven" is a creative masterpiece exploring the use of each deadly sin against a sinner.

The forced attritions through torture seem almost terrifyingly sane in their justification by Doe. Though gluttony, greed, sloth, lust, envy, wrath and pride are the targets, the intended victim of "Seven" is clearly apathy.

Stretching into the genre of cult gore flicks such as "Pulp Fiction" and "Natural Born Killers," the texture of "Seven" plays off sepia-toned shades of earth, wood and light.

The mood is further created as eyes follow the motion and twist of lit angles. The camera sometimes appears as an angel fluttering overhead or a rat scurrying underfoot.

By sacrificing the traditionally omnipresent or objective vantage point of the camera, the perspective of dark realism is realized.

The pounding score by Howard Shore and a soundtrack that includes Nine Inch Nails plunges the viewer sensuously into the deplorable conditions of guile depravity.

Recommending an aesthetically-thrilling movie overwrought with gruesome acts is difficult. However, if the lining of your stomach is deeply anchored and you want to be thrilled, "Seven" will shift your imagination into overload.

Tenderloin exhibits modern-rock incorrectness with frenzied 300-pound male striptease

Scott Allen Miller
contributing writer

Tenderloin brought its deep-fried, wide-eyed and bluesified rock to Bombers Wednesday night.

The crowd of about 60 witnessed the second coming of Kansas City's Ernie Locke, Tenderloin vocalist, harpist, and guitarist — what he called the "second Tenderloin," in Manhattan for the first time.

Anyone who had caught the original Tenderloin lineup before three-fourths of the band went back to school at the University of Kansas would not have recognized this meaner, faster, louder incarnation of the band.

"The first Tenderloin was not as intense as this one," Locke said. "This band is the band."

"With the second Tenderloin, there's nothing held back," he said. "Everything is just full on."

Locke, an intimidating, 300-plus-pound man, lumbered onto the stage in a stained white T-shirt and black shorts that hung desperately low.

Bassist John Cutler of Lawrence looked like he'd just woke up after being sedated for a day. The two Texans in the band, drummer Taz Bentley and guitarist Kirk St. James, were at least presentable.

Once the music started, it was clear just how important a KU education truly is. If those three former members hadn't gone back to KU, this devastating music never would have been possible.

As the band started off with the older Tenderloin tune "Kitchen Floor," it became obvious the band had changed.

Confident as the band sounded playing old stuff, the new material like "One Notch Back," "Alabama Hammer" and "Dip Your Body in Ink" blared out of the speakers with the delicacy of a Texas cactus and the impact of a Kansas wind gust.

This Interstate 35 connection broke all the speed limits and certainly surpassed the limits of the first Tenderloin.

One older tune, "One Kind Favor," was different than the original. Locke brought the band down in volume halfway into this song and began a harp solo.

He slowly brought the band back up to a frenzied level of intensity until finally Tenderloin broke out into a Texas shuffle that would have parted the waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

Locke's rock-slob image did nothing to retain the women in the audience. Many left as the noisy, boisterous, cross-eyed-singing, dancing slab-of-a singer worked his mojo.

When Locke dedicated "Too Late for Romance" to all the pretty ladies in the crowd, the mostly male audience began to chuckle.

Locke had scared many of the women off, and he decided to address the women who had left, in absentia.

"Well, girls, I got a 52-inch bustline, and I'm damn proud of it," he said as the band launched into the Howlin' Wolf groove of the song.

With more rolls than a bakery in the morning and a butt crack well in view, Locke began to lift his shirt and do a strip tease, feeling his sweaty self up as the band jammed the daylights out of the song.

This was almost too funny.

Politically correct or not, it was OK to laugh at his size because Locke was having such a good time, too. It's great that some people in music don't take themselves too seriously.

All you need to know is that Tenderloin is bringing its tattooed and barbecued sound to the Eleventh Hour, 19th and Baltimore streets, in Kansas City, Mo., on Saturday night.

If you missed the band here, make the drive. Tenderloin is music so good it'll make you belch.

Brightest in Kansas deciding on KSU after high school graduation

J. Scot
staff reporter

It is tried and true. Top high school graduates from Kansas select K-State as their school of choice.

For the past four years, students graduating in the top 10 percent of their class have chosen to attend K-State. More than one-third of last spring's top high school graduates are enrolled at K-State.

"We identify, reward and recruit bright students from Kansas. We look for students who are merit scholars, band members, involved with student government and people of color," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president of Institutional Advancement and Dean of Student Life.

K-State has 265 students who ranked first or second in their high school class, he said.

"We are concentrating on the best and the brightest students," K-State President Jon Wefald said.

Wefald said some of the characteristics K-State looks for in high school students as those who were top debaters, student leaders, ranked first or second in their class, band members and merit scholars.

K-State draws people who were involved in diverse activities and did well in school, he said.

"We've succeeded with that goal," Wefald said.

Bright students look to K-State for good academic programs, scholarships and the quality of student life, Bosco said.

"We start working with students in the high school sophomore year, because we have observed that students are interested in post-secondary education early on in their high school careers," he said.

Craig Erpelding, freshman in bakery science and management, graduated first in his class at Manhattan High School. K-State is both challenging and rewarding, and the faculty are very helpful, he said.

"K-State is the only university that offers this degree in the nation," he said.

Jami Nelson, freshman in pre-journalism, also ranked first in her graduating class at Hiawatha High School, and said she chose K-State for several reasons.

"My dad, sister, grandpa and grandma all attended here. I figured if my family liked it, then maybe I would too," she said.

The minute she stepped onto the campus, Nelson said she knew K-State was where she wanted to go to school.

"K-State is wonderful. The people here seem to care that I succeed," she said.

Nelson said she also looked at the University of Kansas, but she did not feel as comfortable there.

Since 1987, K-State has awarded more than 50 Marshall, Rhodes, Truman and Goldwater scholarships to K-State students. That is more than any other public university in America, Wefald said.

"Paul Harvey, a national radio personality, calls K-State the 'student scholar capital of America,'" he said.

▶ PERFORMING ARTS

String quartet entertains students

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Four women dressed in black slacks, sunglasses and Cleveland Indians' baseball hats performed a string version of "Surfin' USA" while children at Manhattan Catholic Schools clapped and sang along Thursday morning.

Annie Fullard, Mari Sato, Kirsten Docter and Merry Peckham make up the Cavani String Quartet, the resident faculty ensemble at the Cleveland Institute of Music. The quartet will kick off its concert season at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Docter, who plays the viola, said this is not the first time the quartet has played in this area. The Cavani String Quartet performed in Manhattan about three years ago, just before Docter joined.

"We play in smaller communities a lot," she said. "We get pleasure out of this because the communities don't get to see live performances as often. Some of them have never heard chamber music before, so it is a new experience."

The Cavani Quartet performs about 60 concerts a year around the country, and, Docter said, the smaller communities are sometimes better audiences.

"A lot of times we feel like the audiences are more receptive because they don't hear this kind of performance as often, so they appreciate it more," she said.

Docter said tonight's concert will be their first since closing the summer season at the end of August.

"It's our first concert of the season. There are a couple of new pieces by Beethoven and Debussy we are excited about. They are wonderful pieces to play over and over, because they are masterpieces," she said.

"We are excited to share them with all the people."

The first piece the group will perform was composed in 1793 by Haydn, and the final piece was composed by Debussy in 1893. Docter said that it is just a coincidence the pieces are 100 years apart, but they thought it was interesting to see how the music had changed.

She said the Debussy music is more impressionistic and colorful with almost a jazz style to it, while the Haydn material is in more of a melodic, classical style.

The quartet performs a variety of music ranging from classical pieces to contemporary arrangements.

"It is important for people to see that classical doesn't mean that you have to sit still all the time," Docter said. "Everyone can enjoy it, and it can be entertaining. We try to bring it closer to home and real life."

The Cavani String Quartet is presented at K-State by the Kansas Arts Commission and the National Endowment for the Arts. Additional funds are provided by the K-State Fine Arts fee.

▶ CANCER PATIENT WEEKS DIES AFTER GIVING BIRTH TO DAUGHTER

DENVER — Three months after learning she was pregnant, Melissa Smart found out she had breast cancer, leaving her with a life-or-death choice.

She chose both.

Smart, 32, passed up a chance to live longer, so she could give birth to her baby. Smart died 18 days after Michelle Elizabeth was born.

"She never acted frightened; she never gave up. She was the bravest person I ever saw," said John Eger, Smart's boyfriend and the baby's father.

When she was diagnosed with cancer that had spread to the lymphatic system, doctors told Smart there was a 10 percent chance she would live five years. Doctors told her in June that in order to undergo intense radiation treatment, she would have to abort her pregnancy.

Eger said the choice was clear.

"That baby meant everything in the world to her," he said.

And when Michelle was born on Aug. 31, Smart was able to savor a short time with her daughter.

"Once they had cleaned the baby off and gave her to Melissa, she just started loving it and kissing it," Eger said.

But on Sept. 16, the night before Smart was to visit her daughter in the hospital, she told Eger, "Pray for me."

Smart died the next day.

"I've thought a lot about what I'll tell Elizabeth about her mother," Eger said. "One thing for sure I'll tell her is, 'Your mother really loved you.'"

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Committee approves cuts

■ Bill to cut spending from agricultural programs

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate Agriculture Committee approved more than $13.4 billion in spending cuts from farm programs over seven years Thursday, averting deadlock that hindered efforts on the House side.

The 9-8 vote came after an agreement that changed the peanut and sugar programs while extending their life. As a result, Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., agreed to abstain rather than vote against it. All eight Democrats opposed it.

Thursday's action means Congress will choose between two different tracks for cutting spending and changing a decades-old farm policy. Both the House and Senate will have to deal with congressional critics who want to end farm programs and resolve a variety of regional differences.

The Senate Committee's bill would shave spending about 17 percent in seven years through a doubling of unsubsidized crop acres and a cap in spending. The basic coupling of subsidies to production and prices would remain.

Corn and wheat farmers would be free to switch from crop to crop without losing subsidies. Cotton and rice farmers would keep their basic program, which provides generous subsidies and limits crop-switching.

The government would quit requiring growers to idle acres in order to continue receiving subsidies and would lower government costs. Such controls have led to grain shortages at times of heavy demand, such as with this year's weather-shortened corn crop.

"I think we've had the most significant piece of agricultural legislation since the Great Depression," said Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind. and committee chairman. "What we did reverses the course of supply control agriculture."

A measure in the House, written by Agriculture Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, would end direct crop subsidies, dismantle the system of price and production formulas and end acreage controls as well. Farmers would get a guaranteed but declining payment based on past subsidies and regardless of current crop prices. Milk production would be deregulated as well.

The bill would lock in a higher amount of overall spending and improve farm income, Roberts said.

Although unified Democratic opposition and a holdout by four cotton-state Republicans forced Roberts to kick the proposal over to budget writers and the House leadership on Wednesday, the Kansas Republican pronounced his bill very much alive Thursday.

"We've just taken a detour," Roberts said. He has gotten the full backing of House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who has suggested possible retaliation against three of the dissident House Republicans, denying them or stripping them of important committee posts.

Roberts noted that Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, had introduced a proposal similar to his and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., has indicated interest.

Critics in both parties, and in both the House and the Senate, said the Roberts measure has a big weakness because it would pay farmers during those seven years even if they planted nothing or crop prices were high. Democrats have hammered the bill on that point.

"There will be tensions with farmers who want and are prepared to see a reduction in federal controls and programs, but at the same time do not want it to be characterized as farmer welfare," Lugar said.

Advocates of the Senate committee's approach said the doubling of unpaid acres from 15 percent to 30 percent will force major changes in agriculture because of lost subsidies on those acres. More crops will have to be grown for the market.

Hydrogen leak delays Columbia's launch

Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Space Shuttle Columbia began leaking explosive hydrogen fuel just hours before liftoff Thursday, forcing NASA to postpone the science mission for a week.

It was the latest in a series of problems plaguing the shuttle program in recent months, including pesky woodpeckers and scorched O-rings.

"That's the luck of the draw," James Harrington, NASA launch director, said.

Liftoff tentatively was rescheduled for Oct. 5 to allow NASA to replace the leaky valve in main engine No. 1 — a new, redesigned engine.

Flammable hydrogen gas began leaking from the engine into the atmosphere after NASA began filling the shuttle's external tank for a mid-morning launch.

The tank holds 528,000 gallons of hydrogen and oxygen, two-thirds of that hydrogen, to drive the three main engines during the climb to orbit.

The seven astronauts had not yet boarded Columbia for their 16-day flight. Because of the danger associated with so much hydrogen, the launch pad is always evacuated during the three hours it takes to fill the tank.

The scrub cost NASA $225,000 in wasted fuel.

During the mission, the astronauts had planned to grow protein and semiconductor crystals, set fires and jiggle drops of fluid in zero gravity, measure shuttle vibrations and tend to potato plants.

It was the first shuttle fuel leak in five years. Columbia was grounded for six months in 1990 by repeated hydrogen leaks; Atlantis also had leaks that year.

A valve of this sort has leaked only once before, in 1981, because of metallic contamination. The cause of Thursday's problem was not immediately known.

Columbia hasn't flown in more than a year. It was in the shop for its periodic tuneup and got two new, more powerful and efficient engines. The leaky fuel valve, however, was not among the redesigned parts.

This is NASA's third mission in a row to be delayed at least one week.

Woodpeckers drilled some 200 holes into the insulating foam of Discovery's external fuel tank in May, delaying that mission by more than a month.

Then, hot rocket gas scorched O-ring seals in the solid-fuel rocket boosters for Atlantis and Discovery. Endeavour underwent repairs to prevent such scorching, delaying its recently completed flight by a month.

Students, administrators and Manhattan leaders walk at the head of the Harmony Walk as it moves down Poyntz Avenue towards Manhattan Town Center. The walk began at City Hall and culminated with two short addresses to the audience by Mayor Edith Stunkel and President Jon Wefald to mark the beginning of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Community walks for harmony

contributing writer

Nearly 300 citizens peacefully demonstrated in the bright afternoon sunlight during the Community Harmony Walk along Poyntz Avenue Sunday.

The long parade of people, made up of K-State students, faculty and community members, helped raise awareness for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week by walking from City Hall to Manhattan Town Center.

Led by Mayor Edith Stunkel and President Jon Wefald, the walk brought out a large diverse group of people.

The walk symbolized the kind of solidarity and the commitment Manhattan has for peaceful resolution of differences, Stunkel said.

"Everyone has an equal responsibility to create a peaceful community," she said.

The Harmony Walk is rooted in the tradition of the civil rights demonstrations of the 1960s led by Martin Luther King Jr. and others.

Wefald said he saw the walk as a peaceful demonstration that alluded to the 1960s.

"I think it's important to demonstrate that we live in a mixing bowl of ethnic and racial groups," Wefald said.

Wefald said he believes racism is the greatest challenge this country has faced since the 17th century.

"Americans' willingness to accept all people makes us strong," he said.

Many of the problems around the world in 1995 are about religion, Wefald said.

"We have to make sure in America we have harmony on all fronts," he said.

We must be harmonious and not adversarial, Wefald said.

The walk was brought up at a meeting, and practically everyone expressed interest in attending, said Craig Benson, senior in management information systems and multicultural events director for Blue Key.

Benson said he was going to try and attend as many of this week's events as he could, because in the past he hasn't been able to do so.

Tara Elbl, sophomore in wildlife biology and Alpha Chi Omega member, attended the walk with a group of about 10 of her sorority sisters.

"We decided as a group to come down to the walk as a service to the community, and it's something we all believe in," she said.

The Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week is co-chaired this year by Barbara Baker and Phil Anderson.

"We're realizing as a society that we're all in this together," Anderson said.

Baker, who was involved in the first Harmony Week held in 1988, said she thought community involvement has increased since the first Harmony Week.

"Students are part of the community and the community is part of the University," Baker said.

The Community Harmony Walk was first suggested by Atina Hanna, the former director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Hanna worked with local Rotarians, represented at the walk by Clyde Jones, in organizing the walk.

"In a way, the walk is very superficial, but it's a start," Hanna said.

The walk ended in the fountain plaza west of Manhattan Town Center and concluded with speeches by Stunkel and Wefald.

The walk was followed by a public dialogue, "Understanding Cultures," facilitated by Doug Benson and Kim Hamilton, which was at the Manhattan Public Library. The dialogue will be repeated Thursday at noon in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Task force proposes new system

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

K-State students might have the option to take classes for no credit and no fees next fall.

At the end of October, the Administrative Task Force on Variable Credit or Experimental Credit could propose the no credit and no fees system, said Matt Soldner, senior in psychology and member of the task force.

"Our goal is to come up with an option that will perhaps allow students to record the fact that they have been in these experiential-type situations without having to pay extra for any credit hours that might be associated with them," said Don Foster, University registrar and chairman of the Administrative Task Force on Variable Credit or Experimental Credit.

James Coffman, provost, and Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, formed the task group in response to concerns from students and faculty that the co-curricular classes will suffer during K-State's switch to the linear fee system next fall.

The task force is researching the no-credit and no-fees system as a potential solution to the possible lack of student participation in co-curricular courses next year.

"I think they knew it was an issue to be addressed because of the changes in the fee schedule," Foster said.

Chester E. Peters, 72, died of a heart attack Sunday afternoon in his Manhattan home.

Emergency efforts to revive his heart had no effect, Karen Hartner, Peters' daughter, said.

Peters had served as president of both K-State's Career Planning Council and the National Association of Student Personnel Administrators, and he served as vice president of student affairs at K-State.

The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex was dedicated in his name to honor the 36 years of service he gave to the students and faculty of the University and the community as a whole.

Peters is survived by his wife, Doris; his son, Steven; and Hartner.

Memorial services will be announced this week.

▶ USER FEES

Reduction in athletic fee would increase ticket prices

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

A decrease in the athletic fee could raise student ticket prices for football and men's basketball games.

The athletic fee will be up for review by Student Senate in February, and some members of student government have proposed making the athletic fee more of a user fee.

User fees mean only the students who use services would have to pay for them. The user-fee system proposal is an attempt to reduce the cost of higher education.

Athletic tickets are a user fee that is already in place in the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. Students may purchase reduced-price tickets for football and men's basketball games because of subsidies provided by the student athletic fee.

The idea of user fees is to decrease the fees paid by each student, but the athletic department is lobbying for an increase in its student fee.

Mark Tomb, Senate Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said the athletic department would like a $3 increase in the student fee or a $1 increase in men's basketball and football ticket prices. A $3 increase would make the athletic fee $20.

Tomb said he would rather see the students who attend the games pay a little more, but he has not made any decision because the fee has not gone through the review process.

User fees would place more of the financial burden through increased ticket prices on students who purchase athletic tickets. Only students who buy tickets for the games would have to pay to support athletic programs.

Tomb said the $1 increase in ticket prices would be a user-fee increase.

Max Urick, athletic director, said

Enforcing policy

■ No-alcohol rule unpopular among fans

Collegian staff

A loud rumbling "boo" rose from 38,000 fans at the Northern Illinois game Saturday when an announcement clarified the no-alcohol policy before kick-off.

The message was loud and clear: Some fans just don't like the policy.

"I didn't see a problem in the first place. I guess it's kind of like 'if it's not broken, don't fix it,'" Kyle Adams, 1995 alumni, said. "Part of football is being with friends and family, having cookouts and drinking a couple."

The policy is disappointing, but enforcing it will be a problem, Adams said.

"I brought it in anyway. I don't know how they're enforcing it," he said.

Twenty K-State Police officers, the entire force, worked during game day, Sgt. Jim Lehne said.

Tickets were not issued at Saturday's game, but one person was ejected from the stadium.

"They had alcohol in the stadium, and we forced them to leave the game," Lehne said.

Although informative pamphlets were not handed out at the game, police said they were educating the public by warning people, asking fans to pour the alcohol out and returning to the site to make sure fans complied, Lehne said.

"People get uptight about it," he said.

Lance Lunsway, parking control supervisor, said parking control officers where looking for kegs of beer or other visible beer as people entered the parking lot at KSU Stadium.

The parking control officers' instructions were not to allow people with kegs to enter.

During a stretch before the game, of about 50 cars that entered through gate three, on the west side of the stadium, no

▶ 'FBA' PRANKSTER EMPTIES PRINTER TRAYS ACROSS K-STATE CAMPUS

Campus pranksters cost the University time and money by depleting the paper supply in printers across campus early Friday morning.

Sheets boldly stating "fba" printed to more than eight printing servers on campus at about 3:30 a.m. Friday.

"It's a major annoyance because it is a waste of my time having to clean up after them," said Harvard Townsend, computer and network system manager for Computing and Information Services.

The printers included Computing and Network Services, CIS, Grain Marketing Research, College of Engineering, the College of Education, School of Journalism and the K-State Student Union.

"They printed until the trays were finished," Townsend said.

Townsend does not know how many printers the prank affected, but it was a waste of paper, toner and caused wear and tear on the printers, he said.

Sgt. Jim Lehne of the K-State Police said the people who initiated the printing could face charges of theft of services, unauthorized computer access or other charges.

But it is possible the people might not be charged at all, and dealt with on an administrative level, he said.

"There's a number of things, it depends on the situation," he said.

The mysterious letters "fba," are not a student or faculty's initials. The letters might stand for a group name or could be used just to confuse people, Townsend said.

Finding the alleged criminals is possible, and the incident will be handled with the help of the campus police, Townsend said.

The availability of printing will probably not be affected by the prank, John Bucher, director of CNS, said.

"It could be that if we're going to have services like this we're going to have to put up with these incidents," Bucher said.

Townsend said the only solution would be to cut off the service or to leave it vulnerable.

▶ 'HIGHER LEARNING' SPARKS DISCUSSION ON CAMPUS RACISM, SEXISM

Making personal choices about racial and ethnic harmony is a hot issue for K-State students this week.

"Think," said Anne Butler, interim director of the Women's Studies Program. "Develop you're own points of view.

"Don't be afraid to step to a different drummer," she said, during a panel discussion in K-State Student Union's Forum Hall Sunday night.

The Union Program Council's Multicultural Committee began Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week by sponsoring a forum and watching "Higher Learning," a film that deals with sexual, racial and moral issues on a college campus.

The movie brought home many of the problems that exist on this campus to an audience of about 100 people.

"In the reality of this campus and the things that I have experienced across this country, I think it touches on the issues that affect us all," Freeman Davis, coordinator multicultural affairs, said.

A panel discussion followed the movie with 11 student and faculty members.

Tamara Jordon, senior in mass communication, said the movie was extreme, but the problems are at K-State.

"The movie was a bit too extreme for being here on K-State campus. My main concern is that we deal with our own issues in our life," Jordon said.

Many of the problems discussed were the same ones students fought in the 1960s.

"As the movie opened it could have very well been 1966, the year I went to college. I have spent the last 30 years to work toward justice," he said.

"It is heart wrenching to see that not much has changed," Butler said.

The discussion focused on the choices people have to make.

"Life is like a tunnel, we make an entrance and at some time we make an exit. Along the way we make choices." Davis said. "No matter where we are in life, we do have options in life."

Change through choice might be slow, but with education and respect steps can be taken.

"It comes down to respect. I want people to treat me the way they want me to treat them," Patrick Carney, senior in political science, said.

Although the panel and the audience of about 50 people disagreed on many issues, the group attempted to bridge racial and ethnic gaps.

Rustlin' up music at the Zoo

■ Country music festival ropes in crowd of 1,000

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Manhattan Sunset Zoo threw it's third-annual country music festival Sunday to celebrate Family Weekend and National Arts and Humanities month.

The event was a casual affair with 20 to 60 people clustering in the pavilion, rodeo arena or wildlife theater at any time.

The zoo was open for business as usual throughout the day, so when patrons weren't enjoying a show, they could be seen strolling along zoo paths, looking for the exotic animal residents.

Angie Fenstermacher, Sunset Zoo's marketing and development director, said the event went well, with day-long attendance figures of close to 1,000 people.

"We've had good weather, the kids had a great time and the K-State Rodeo Club did a great job with the kids," she said.

Several events took place throughout the day, with country music and the Kid's Rodeo taking the cake. Jenni Raynor and Hard to Handle kicked off the event after KSU's rodeo presentation. Later in the day, Midnight Run took the audience for a spin with their high-powered country tunes.

The Kid's Rodeo took place beneath the afternoon shade of the pavilion tree line. The coral was constructed of horizontally stacked bales of hay. It encompassed eight club members who helped the children learn about rodeo.

Lena Ratliff, Miss Rodeo K-State, said the rodeo club kicked off the country music festival with a great presentation of rodeo and bull riding.

She said members showed what preparation goes into bull riding, what equipment is used and how to wrap their hands in the rope during a ride.

"The kids are having a ball," Ratliff said. Most are under age seven and there have been a few adults."

In the arena, three barrels set in a clover leaf pattern were used as a barrel racing area where children could race each other on stick horses. Members attempted to teach the crowd how to rope hay "steers" with lassos. Ratliff also signed autographs.

"Parents here heard a lot about what the riders go through," Ratliff said.

"I feel like we've been really productive today."

Soon after the band was done, a free two-stepping dance lesson was taught by Ron and Catherine Dunn, who teach all over the United States.

They were ready and willing to teach the crowd how to waltz and line dance, but the crowd was pretty kicked back and watched the four to eight couples try their luck.

"It's your job to guide her and her job to let you," Catherine Dunn said. "Ninety percent of the time, ladies, you're going to be going backwards."

People between ages 5 and 70 partook of the dancing and went round and round in a counter-clockwise circle. Long... long... short, short, she said in counts of six.

The Texas two-step seemed to be the most popular of the many styles and fashions of the dance.

"If you learn the waltz, you will be in high demand," Ron Dunn said, laughing.

The Dunns teach lessons at 7 p.m., every Monday night at Troopers on Fort Riley.

"There's no one there but us dancers, so it's not a drunken place," Catherine Dunn said.

"They even allow children."

After the dance lessons, Midnight Run took the stage at the pavilion and jumped immediately from song to song. Each song matched the performer's personalities and voices.

A full sound resonated exceptionally well throughout the outdoor pavilion during the country music festival. Although both bands played well, the dance floor remained an empty patch of asphalt.

Overall, the zoo seemed somewhat quiet, perhaps stemming from children's short attention spans or the constant harassment of bees.

Tricia Perry brought her two children and said they had a good time.

"The only thing I wish they had was more animals," she said. "We have been through three times already, and the kids asked where all the other animals are at."

A live-animal program was presented by Schanee' Johnson, curator of education, at 2 and 4:30 p.m. Patrons got to see four and touch two live animals in the show.

A Madagascar hissing cockroach, a red-tailed hawk, a hedge hog and a Savanna monitor interacted with adults and children.

During the show, Johnson informed patrons about the dangers of owning exotic pets, which affect both the animals and the owners.

She said many people who buy exotic pets are ignorant of the breeding and feeding responsibilities associated with non-domestic pets.

"Your pet is your life-long responsibility to take care of," she said.

She said some of the animals living at the zoo were donated by people who weren't sure of how to take care of them. Many of these animals were also found or injured.

"The major reason we do this is because there is no better way to educate people about the importance of animals and the needs they have, by showing them face to face," Johnson said.

Student position needed on Board of Regents

In order to get a student position created on the board, the Kansas Constitution would have to be changed.

The students who pay tuition at the Kansas Board of Regents schools deserve not only to be heard, but to have a vote.

Students have a voice on the board in the form of the Student Advisory Council.

However, the council does as its name implies; it advises. The regents do not have to listen to the council.

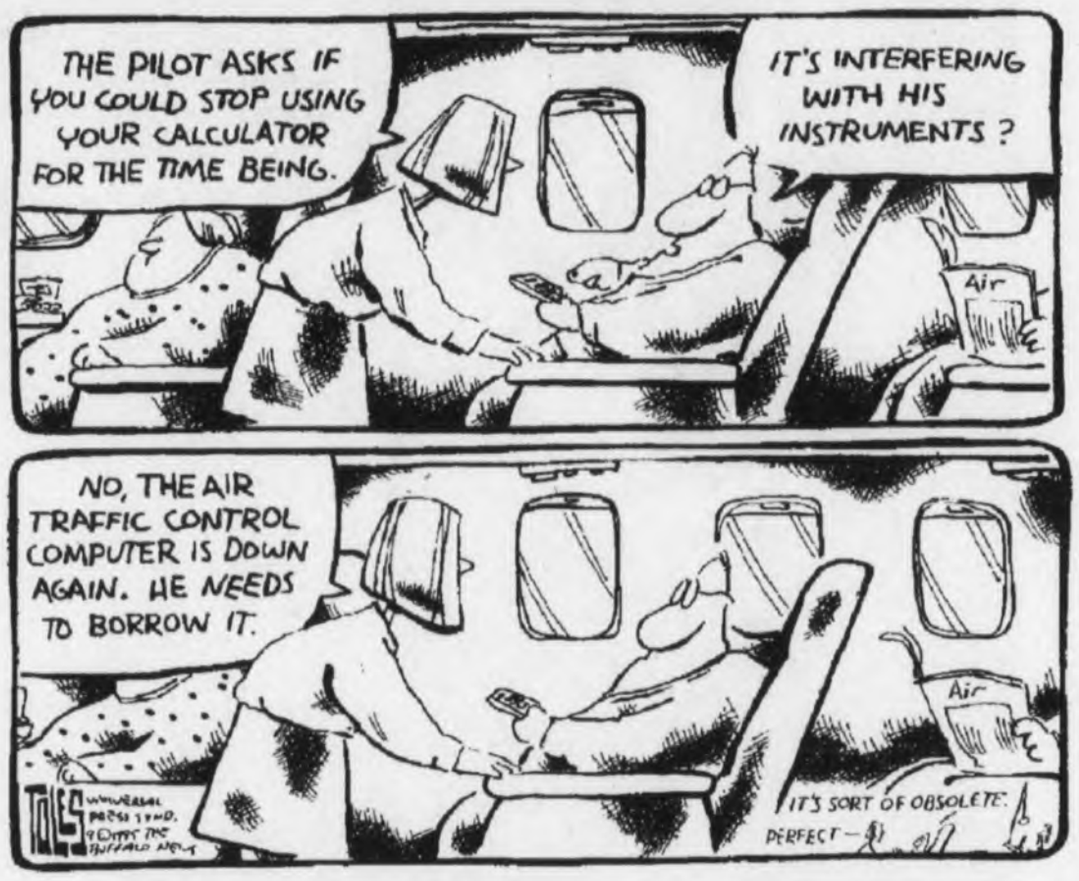
Student Senate has made an attempt to get someone with student concerns in mind appointed to the board by passing a resolution encouraging Gov. Bill Graves to appoint a student or recent graduate to the board.

The governor makes appointments to the board, and the Kansas Senate confirms the appointments.

Although Student Senate's efforts are noble, its plan is not feasible.

Kansas statue does not prohibit a student from being appointed to the board, but the time and resources required to be a member does.

Members of the board have to take off at least two days a month to travel all over the state for meetings. They are appointed to the board for four-year terms and are not paid.



The alternative would be to create a permanent voting position for a student who would be appointed for a one- or two-year term.

The student would probably have to be a part-time student or be given a sabbatical from school while serving on the board.

In order to get a student position created on the board, the Kansas Constitution would have to be changed.

Although this is a much more difficult process, in the long-run, it would be the more reasonable solution to the problem.

Weaving through the maze of the auto insurance game

I was invoved in a minor auto accident last Monday afternoon, so the topic of auto insurance has been on my mind lately.

In 1993, the American Automobile Association reported that the average American spent $638 per car on auto insurance. I pay (actually my father pays) close to $1,000 a year for liability coverage on my pick-up truck because of my past driving history. One-thousand dollars for liability coverage, with no collision or comprehensive coverage.

Even though the accident was very minor, I still had to report it to my insurance company. Most companies require the policy holder to report all auto accidents within 24 to 48 hours after the accident.

I will probably have three more years of surcharges for a $200 accident. What to buy, how much to buy? Kansas law require all drivers to have insurance coverage to cover bodily injury and property damage.

■ Bodily-injury liability coverage pays for medical, rehabilitation, and funeral costs if you are found at fault. It also pays legal costs and settlements for non-monetary losses such as pain and suffering. It compensates the other driver, the other driver's passengers, passengers in your car and pedestrians whom you injure.

■ Property-damage liability coverage pays for repair and replacement of vehicles and any other property you may damage in an accident. It compensates the owners of the damaged property.

In addition, there are other types of coverage that may be purchased.

■ Uninsured motorists pay for medical costs, rehabilitation, funeral costs and losses from pain and suffering resulting from an accident caused by a hit-and-run driver or by a driver without insurance.

■ Collision pays for repairs of automobiles damaged in a collision regardless of fault. It also reimburses the car's market value — minus the deductible — when the vehicle is totaled.

■ Comprehensive pay for repairs of auto damage from windstorms, flood, fire, vandalism and some other events such as theft. It reimburses market value of the vehicle or vehicle parts — minus the deductible — after the damage.

■ Ways to lower your auto insurance premiums exist. If you carry collision or comprehensive coverage on your vehicle, consider having a deductible such as $500, but at very least $250.

If you have a moderately priced car more than five-years-old, you can save more money by dropping collision and comprehensive entirely. It is very likely the vehicle's value has dropped so much that you wouldn't get much from the insurer if the vehicle were totaled or stolen.

However, most banks and financial institution require either collision and comprehensive or both types of coverage if there is any money owed on the vehicle. Other ways to lower premiums is to install anti-theft devices and have passive restraints such as automatic safety belts and air bags. One way to lower premiums for males under the age of 30 is to get married.

In a vehicle safety features such as anti-lock brakes and air bags can reduce the premium for a certain model of vehicle. Safety records of vehicle are very important to insurance companies. Luxury or performance vehicles are more costly to insure, especially for college students.

COLUMN

SCOTT SMITH

The most important way to lower your auto insurance premiums is to have a good driving record.

In my case, in November 1992, I had a serious auto accident that nearly totaled my new truck. Three months later, in February 1993, I drove my truck into a telephone pole, which totaled it.

Needless to say, my insurance company was not impressed — thus, my $1,000 per year for liability insurance. I was waiting until February 1996 for my accidents to get off of my record.

Now, I don't know how long I will have wait until my record will be clear of accidents.

Many insurance companies will ask for your driving record during the last three years. This will include all tickets and accidents during this period. Don't lie — they will check with the state driver's license bureau.

Shopping around for the best deal is important.

When it comes to cost, it can be difficult to shop for the best deal. Insurance companies can charge widely different prices for similar coverage.

Service is impossible to judge until you are involved in an accident. You might ask a friend or family member about their insurance company and experience.

My insurance company is referred to as a direct writer. I call an 800 number and deal with an employee, not a commission agent or broker. Direct writers often offer very competitive rates because they don't pay commissions, which can add 5 to 15 percent to the premium.

To identify the low-priced companies, obtain a copy from the State Insurance Commissioners Office in Topeka at 1-800-432-2484. Another good source of information concerning auto insurance is a current issue of Consumer Reports.

Should you have any questions concerning auto insurance or other consumer issues, please do not hesitate to contact me at the Office of Consumer and Tenant Affairs on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union at 532-6541.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week in need of inclusive definition

Queers are the unwanted step-children of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

The group of people who bring you Harmony Week each year can't seem to agree whether queers belong in the week's celebrations. The name of the week, as it stands, doesn't seem to suggest that queers belong.

But there are members of the Harmony Week committee who believe queers DO belong, and the name of the week needs to be changed to Harmony Week to reflect the reality about what the ideals of the week are — cooperation, tolerance and increased understanding between differing groups of people who have to live together at K-State.

COLUMN

KEVYN JACOBS

Unfortunately, there apparently are members of the committee who believe that unity and diversity should not include a minority that is behavior-based.

In other words, these people believe it's wrong to treat an African-American as a second-class member of our community, but it's OK to treat a queer like trash.

Just how unwanted queers are in Harmony Week hit home for me a few years back when staff at the Manhattan Public Library decided to intentionally omit queer culture from a display about Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

That particular year, the committee grudgingly allowed queer events to be publicized in conjunction with Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

As has happened over the course of several years (but interestingly, not this one), diversity events about queer life and issues were presented and listed on the Harmony Week calendar.

This year, there aren't any queer events included. I am told this is not because they aren't allowed to, but because nobody bothered to put any on.

And blame here can be just as easily put on the K-State queer community, who didn't bother to get involved with the Harmony Week committee.

But it isn't as if they were encouraged to get involved, either. There are too many members of the committee who want to keep queer issues out to make the committee a welcoming place.

It seems to me that the Harmony Week committee needs to make a decision.

Is the emphasis of this week about "Racial and Ethnic," or is it about "Harmony?"

If the emphasis is about the "Racial and Ethnic," then there is clearly no room for queers at this table.

The committee should politely, but firmly, resolve that no further queer events will be allowed to be held in conjunction with Harmony Week.

By continuing to do so, without full support, the committee is stringing the queer community along, and is ultimately doing students at K-State a disservice.

And if the emphasis of the week is about harmony, then the committee needs to do the right thing and change the name to Harmony Week.

That way, queers, as well as people of differing religions and people with physical limitations, can feel included. The current name is exclusive, and suggests anything BUT harmony.

It's time for the Harmony Week committee to shit or get off the pot.

▶ JACOBS FIXATES

Editor,

This letter is in response to the column "Any Choice of Sexuality Remains Valid" by Kevyn Jacobs. I must first begin by saying, Kevyn, this column sounds as if you have a fixation with your own sexual activity and have used this column as a way to perhaps announce that you are seeking a new sexual partner, regardless of gender.

I take offense to your mention of the omnisexual woman who decides not to "limit her options" just in case a woman she likes comes along.

WHAT! Inherent in that statement is the suggestion that sexual orientation is based on sexual activity. You have defiled and reduced our community to that of sexual misfits.

Furthermore, while the GLB community at K-State and globally has tried to demythologize such perceptions surrounding us, in the time it took you to write this column and have it published, you have defeated nearly all the efforts of the community.

Therefore, I must question your motive behind writing this column. It certainly wasn't to further the goals and efforts of our community. Furthermore, while it is already difficult for bisexuals to feel empowered by acceptance and recognition, your words only lend credence to the misconceptions regarding bisexuality.

This mention of whether being accepting is politically correct, being gay is not an issue of being PC as you state, but rather an issue of just BEING.

Being a columnist whose writings are devoted predominately to issues of homosexuality, you further muddy the waters of acceptance and understanding.

Again, I take offense when you negatively eluded to concerns you have with the religious community and the GLB community.

Admittedly, I too am bothered with the relationship that our community and the religious community shares.

However, I do not let it bother me to the level that apparently affects you as I have found a balance in my life to accept my natural orientation and still have a spiritual relationship with Christ.

Your suggestions only add fuel to the fire that exists between the two.

When you make such statements, you are no better than the religious zealots who attack us.

The well-versed gay activist who I once considered to be the person known as Kevyn Jacobs has failed to reveal himself in this column. Kevyn, please restore my faith in your service to the community and tell me this is a fabricated story, one that you created to shock the masses. I only pray this is the case.

If not, I am afraid that you are damaging not only your reputation and credibility, but doing a great injustice to our community.

If this is not a joke, I would invite you to apply for a position as a writer on Rikki Lake's talk show. Her show is more welcoming to this kind of sensationalized banter that you consider journalism.

Frank Axell
1993-95 President of Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Society

Pakistan spices up weekend

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

The spicy aroma of Pakistan food wafted through the displays of music, dance and clothing as students, faculty and community members experienced the richness of Pakistan Sunday.

About 60 people gathered together to celebrate the culture and cuisine of Pakistan at the Riley County Seniors Service Center.

"My goal is to introduce Pakistan culture to the Manhattan community," Shazia Aqeel, president of Pakistan Student Association, said.

Many people walked passed display tables that had traditional hand-sewn clothing and shoes.

Lala Rukh, Manhattan resident, said most of the embroidery and stitching in the clothing is still hand-sewn by women in Pakistan.

The evening's festivities also helped celebrate Pakistan independence from Britain after 200 years of colonial rule.

"Independence day of Pakistan is on Aug. 14, but there weren't many students here to celebrate then." Abid Burki, graduate student in economics, said.

The celebration is much like July Fourth to the United States, Burki said.

"We march through the streets and decorate with Pakistan flags. Fireworks start a few days before independence day," he said.

The celebration also included a reenactment of a Pakistan wedding ceremony, called Mehndi.

Mehndi, a natural powder mixed with water, is painted on the hands of the bride with intricate designs. The ceremony also included feeding the bride and groom sweets and waving money over their head, Rima Ahmed, junior in mechanical engineering, said.

Members of PSA modeled traditional Pakistan clothing during a fashion show to display how clothing styles differ between Pakistan's four provinces, Ahmed said.

"Every province has their own different type of style. You can tell what province they come from by looking at them," Aqeel said. "One province uses mirror work and uses a lot of white colors."

Most of the clothing was made with a silk and cotton, and used colorful thread and bead work to represent the lifestyles of the Pakistan people, Ahmed said.

PSA members danced to a fast, upbeat tempo. The traditional folk dance called Luddi, expresses happiness and is commonly performed at weddings, Ahmed said.

William Richter, assistant provost for International Programs, was the guest of honor at the festivities and told the audience about the importance of having such events.

"It is valuable to have an evening such as this to remind us we are an international University. You enrich our classes and our University," he said.

The events were followed with a dinner representing many types of cuisine eaten in Pakistan.

Aqeel said most types of Pakistan food can be summed up with one word — spicy.

"We use 20 different spices in some sauces," she said.

There are more than 20 different kinds of rice dishes and breads, she said.

Football's benefits extend beyond stadium

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

The K-State football team isn't the only one who benefits from out-of-town fan support.

Manhattan businesses do quite well, also.

Area hotels, restaurants, bars and stores profit from alumni and parents who pour into Manhattan for Wildcat home football games.

Becky Blake, director of Manhattan Convention and Visitors Bureau, said it is hard to tell exactly how much Manhattan benefits from home games. But in 1994, the bureau made some estimates.

"In 1994, we estimated about a half-million dollars direct expenditure per game," Blake said. "That means people attending games spend about that much money outside of the game itself.

"Obviously, people who come into town will spend money on food, hotels, gas, shopping and entertainment."

Blake said the estimated amount spent for each home game has a multiplier of 2.5, which means the money would turn over in the community about 2-1/2 times.

In Aggieville, the bars tend to open earlier on Saturdays for home games.

"We'll open up a couple of hours earlier," Rhett Butler, owner of Scoreboard, said. "For the big home games like KU and Oklahoma, we might even open up earlier."

Butler said for afternoon games, it's usually the students who come in before the games to drink, while most alumni tailgate. After the game is when alumni like to go to the bars.

"The alumni will hit it hard after the game," Butler said. "Students usually like to go sleep it off after games so they can come out later to party."

> BECKY BLAKE
> DIRECTOR OF MANHATTAN CONVENTION AND VISITORS BUREAU

Lucky BrewGrille also opens up earlier for home games.

"We usually open up about two hours earlier," said Mike Closson, general manager of Lucky BrewGrille. "It's usually alumni from out of town that come in."

Closson said about 30 minutes after the game is when they usually get packed.

"It's usually one in, one out by 6 o'clock," Closson said. "That means we're pretty much maxed out."

After games, the bars aren't the only places that get packed, area restaurants get hit pretty hard also. In some restaurants, the wait can be more than two hours.

"Sometimes home games can really affect us," Jamie Williamson, Carlos O'Kelly's hospitality manager, said. "Night games don't affect us much, but business following afternoon games is great.

"We've had the wait get up to about 2-1/2 hours after games."

Williamson said day games can affect their business by about $5,000. She also said they don't require any more employees because the restaurant usually runs with a full staff on Saturdays no matter what.

Steve Levin, assistant manager of Varney's Book Store, said Varney's does a large amount of business selling K-State souvenirs.

"Home games definitely boost our business," he said.

Levin said Varney's likes to be as involved as it can be with K-State athletics.

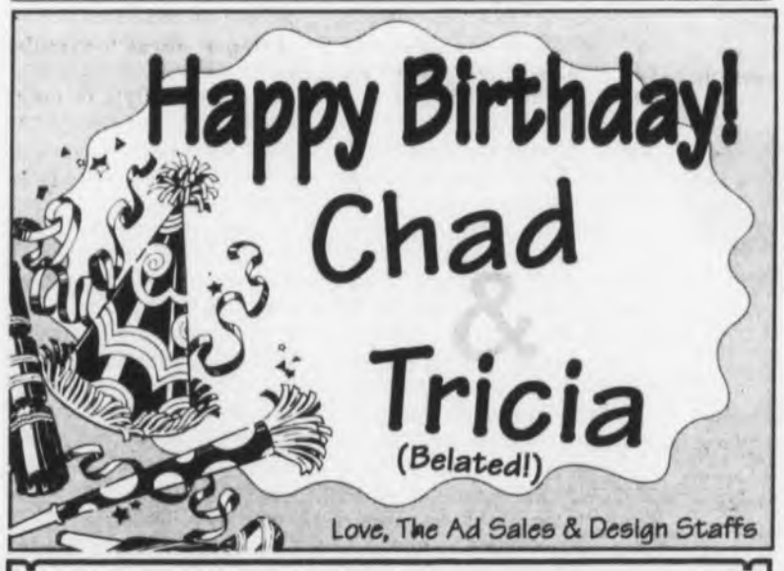
"The whole Varney's crew is really behind K-State," Levin said. "We try to open early on game days and try to help create some excitement.

"We sell lots of K-State shirts and jackets. We have to prepare for home-game weekends by packing our floor with fresh and new merchandise."

People flood into Manhattan for home games. They eat, they shop and ultimately, they'll need a place to sleep.

"We're always sold out on home-game weekends," said Chris Maher, front desk manager for Ramada Inn. "When it comes to football weekends, we're booked out months in advance. People have already started asking about next year."

Ken Komenda, general manager for Best Western Inn, said not only do they book up with K-State alumni and parents of students, but they fill up with parents and fans for the opposing teams.



"We start getting requests for rooms as soon as the new schedule for the upcoming season comes out," Komenda said.

Moore and more wins, Wefald's bat, other thoughts

The K-State's volleyball team won a total of seven games in 1993. They doubled that in '94, finishing the season 14-13.

The Wildcats now sit at 13-2, having knocked off Colorado for the first time since 1987.

"I have made it really hard, and they have fought through it and fought through it and fought through it," K-State volleyball coach Jim Moore said of preparing his team for the 16th ranked Buffaloes.

COLUMN

DAN LEWERENZ

"It's all them, and that's for sure. They set their minds to it, they knew exactly what they had to do, and they did it."

Those of you who missed Saturday night's match really missed out. Ahearn Field House just plain kicks ass, and it's about time we got a team that can get the place rockin' again. The 1,500-or-so fans who came to watch the Cats made more noise than Bramlage Coliseum has ever seen.

So the volleyball team has the talent. They've got the drive. They've got the leadership. They've got what it takes to make this an exciting season.

Now all we need are crowds. The turnout Saturday was good, but we can do better. This Wednesday, I want you to skip formal dinner and chapter, forget Bible study, vacate Aggieville (at least until after the match) and watch the Cats take on Iowa State at 7:30 p.m.

And be rowdy. Yell, scream, cheer and generally make a fool of yourself (although I don't think this is the appropriate venue to throw tortillas). Think up your own little piece of insanity to bring to the match.

Just bring your self and your insanity and have a good old time.

Speaking of time, it took some time for the Cats to put away Northern Illinois Saturday afternoon. At the end of the first half, the Cats held a precarious 7-0 lead.

If only ICAT had given the team those annoying clicker key-chains, the situation could have been much different. Following the game, senior Matt Miller indicated that clicking is essential to the execution of the offense.

"We just didn't get things done. And I give all credit to their defense, they came out and played hard, and things just weren't clicking," Miller said.

The Cat defense, on the other hand, needed no clicking to shut out the Huskies.

"Thank God we've got a defense like we've got to keep us in the game when we're not clicking," Miller said.

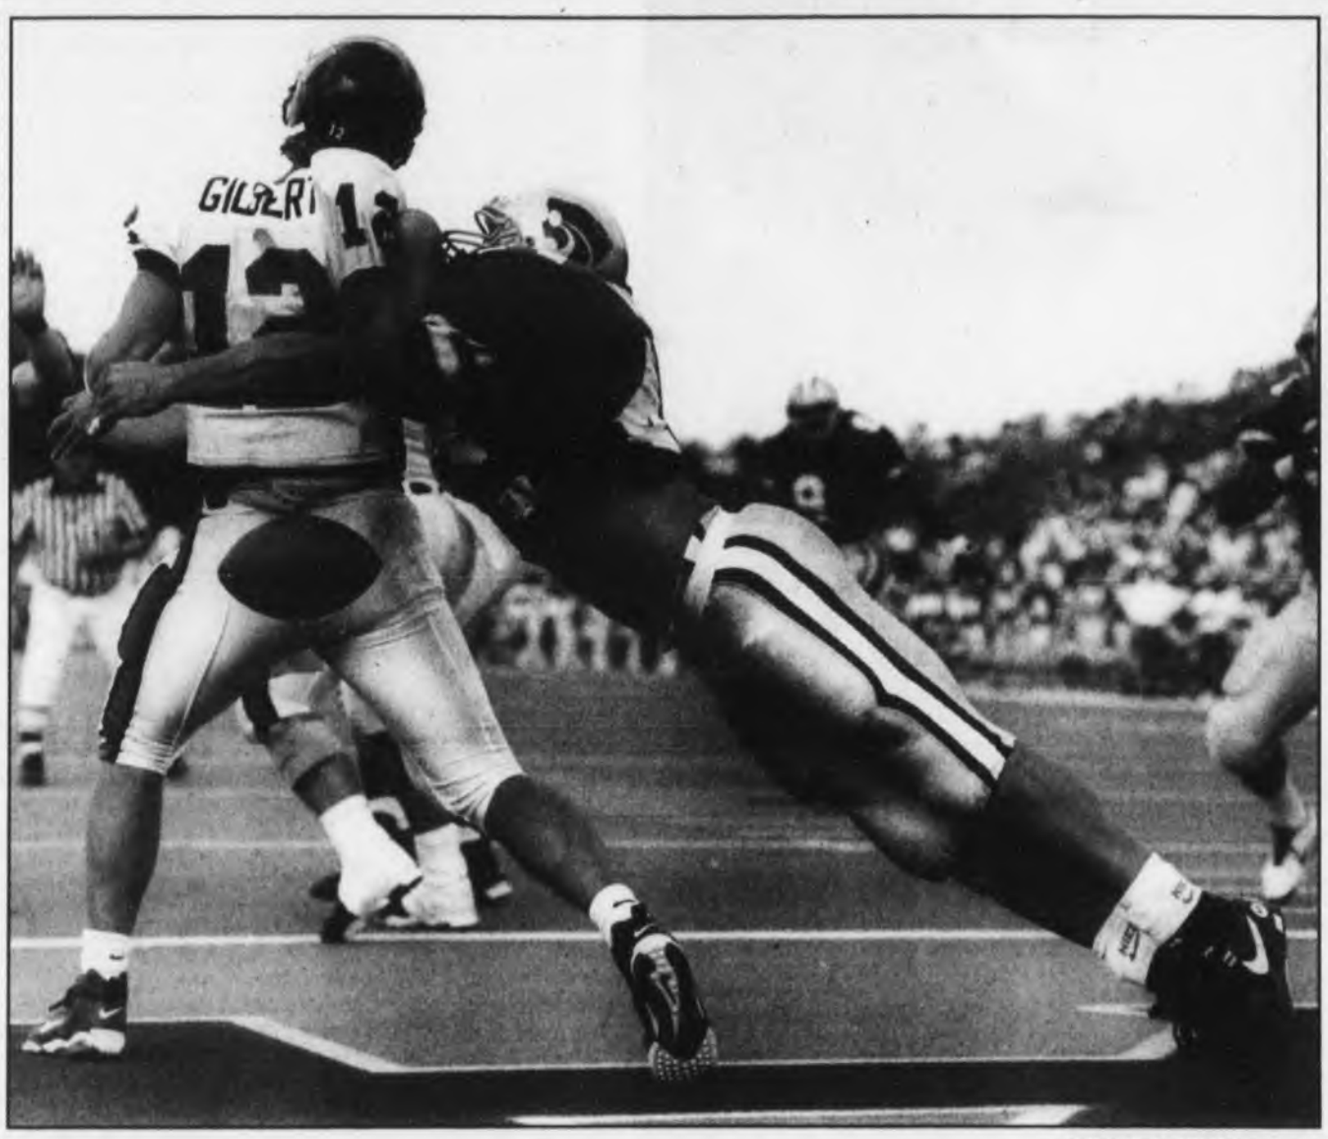
But it seems that the team may have access to clickers in the near future. Statements by senior receiver Mitch Running indicate that the Cats may already have clickers.

"Everything is starting to click offensively right now with the passing game," Running said.

Miller stated that the team would like to be using clickers in practice this week.

"We've just got to work hard and do everything we can all week and get things clicking," Miller said.

On a completely unrelated topic, the somewhat-annual Student Governing Association—Administration Softball Challenge will be at 4 today at Gold Field in CiCo Park.



Donations will be taken to benefit the United Way.

Cats dominate Northern Illinois

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

The K-State defense scored its second-straight shutout Saturday, a 44-0 trouncing of Northern Illinois before a crowd of 38,527 at KSU Stadium.

K-State 44 N. Illinois 0

Wildcat defensive lineman Dirk Ochs didn't need to pour over the mountain of post-game statistics or the three-hour game film to break down the implications of playing good defense.

"If they don't score, we won't lose the game, because our offense will score points," Ochs said.

And if the defense keeps playing the way they have been, the offense won't have the pressure to put up the huge numbers week in and week out.

"It was our best effort of the year," co-defensive coordinator Bobby Stoops said. "We played very physical today."

While the offense struggled in the first half, the defense kept the Cats in the game, allowing only 71 yards total offense and holding quarterback Aaron Gilbert to three of 13 passes.

"We didn't get any long passes caught against us, so we did OK," cornerback Joe Gordon said.

The Cats managed only one scoring drive in the first half, going into the break-up at 7-0.

"A lot of the guys, I felt, came out flat," Gordon said. "We had to play better in the second half to establish ourselves."

Suffice to say, K-State established itself in the second half on both sides of the ball.

The Cats blew the game open in the second half. The offense took the ball and promptly drove 62 yards in 12 plays, taking a 14-0 lead on Matt Miller's 1-yard keeper. On the Northern Illinois' next series, Nyle Wiren belted Gilbert in the end zone, forcing a safety.

"We were struggling for it down there," Wiren said of the scrum in the end zone. "We were fighting for it, but one of their lineman jumped on it."

Six minutes into the half K-State led 16-0, and it got worse for the Huskies. Northern Illinois squibbed the kickoff after the safety, and fullback Dederick Kelly returned it 13 yards to the Husky 46. After a 16-yard holding call and a 9-yard sack, the Cats were faced with a second-and-27 from their own 37.

Miller then turned to Lockett to put the game away. On second down, Lockett caught a 13-yard pass and a 19-yard pass to get the first down, and a 31-yard pass for a touchdown on the next play to give K-State a 23-0 lead.

On the game, Lockett caught a career-high nine passes for 116 yards and two touchdowns and passed former Cat and San Diego Chargers wide receiver Andre Coleman with 13 career scores through the air.

"In the first half, we just didn't get things done," said Miller, who played perhaps his best game of the year, going 19-for-27 for 230 yards and three touchdowns. "We came out and did the same things, we just executed a lot better."

The Cats capped off the third quarter when Miller hit Lockett for a 5-yard score to hit 30-0 with 34 seconds left.

With a big lead, the defense could concentrate on getting its shutout, which it did in sterling fashion, allowing only 84 yards total offense, a microscopic 1.6 per play. On eight occasions, Northern Illinois went three plays and punt.

"We played well on defense in the first half with the exception of two scrambles," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "I was pleased with the shutout. That's what defensive people strive and live for. That is the ultimate."

Snyder said he was particularly impressed that the Cat's recorded their second consecutive shutout.

"It's been a long time since it's happened here," Snyder said.

The last time the Cats recorded consecutive shutouts was in the 1973 season, when K-State defeated Tulsa 21-0 and Tampa 17-0.

But the defense isn't content with its performance in the non-conference season. The best, namely Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma, are still to come.

"We're working hard and we need to get better each week and that's the key," said Wiren, who had five tackles, one sack and one caused fumble.

Gordon says the ultimate goal for the defense during the Big 8 season is to stop, not contain, the opponent.

"We still got a lot to prove in the Big 8," Gordon said. "At this point, we're not a dominating defense, so we got a lot of areas to improve on."

Lockett breaks TD receptions record

Shana Newell
staff writer

It's been a record-breaking season for the K-State Wildcats, and junior wide receiver Kevin Lockett is no exception.

In Saturday's game against Northern Illinois, Lockett scored two touchdown receptions, bringing his career total to 14.

That breaks former K-State wide receiver Andre Coleman's career record of 12.

Against the Huskies' defense, Lockett caught the ball nine times for a total of 116 yards, including a 31-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Matt Miller in the third quarter, increasing the Wildcat lead to 22-0.

Wide open in the end zone, Lockett waited for the pass from Miller. He later said he was a little nervous.

"I knew that if I dropped that one, I'd be kidded by my teammates and even by the crowd," he said. "Yeah, I was nervous."

As part of the talented three-pronged receiving corps that has opposing coaches scrambling to find a defensive scheme to shut them down, Lockett has some competition on the field, and it is not always from the defenders.

With wide receivers Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger also vying for reception yardage, extreme pride and excitement surround the trio when they speak of their counterparts.

"Kevin had a great game today. He always gets in the end zone — he's got a knack for it," Running said. "He's having a great year so far, and it's all that much better that everything's happening so well for him."

"Heading into the Big 8 right now, I think everything's going great for him," Running said.

Schwieger said he was amazed about Lockett breaking Coleman's record.

"He broke it, and it's going to be shattered after next year, if he comes back — just kidding," Schwieger said. "We were both tied coming into the season with career catches, so we knew one of us would approach breaking it. I didn't expect him to shatter it this bad, but he's doing a good job."

Coach Bill Snyder said he hesitates to promote Lockett's talent — that he'd run wild with that.

"He's doing a nice job, but I just know he's capable of even more," Snyder said. "I don't expect him to drop the football, I don't ever expect him to drop the football."

Miller said it's comforting to have the type of talent that Lockett brings to the receiving corps on the field.

"I have complete faith in all three of those guys. I know on third downs one of them is going to get open," Miller said.

Often, that someone is Lockett, but Snyder said although the receivers are open, it may not always be due to their abilities.

"I'd like to say that what happened today was because of the great talent," Snyder said.

Snyder said Northern Illinois' defense fell apart allowing Lockett to get open.

"They busted the coverage as the jargon goes and that's exactly what happened. Everybody was in one coverage except the corner on that side, he thought it was going to be a roll to the corner, everybody else was playing outside coverage," he said.

Lockett now has seven touchdown receptions this year and leads the Big 8 in that category.

In addition, he became only the fourth player in school history to attain at least 100 career receptions last week against Akron.

In the game against the Huskies, Lockett was able to increase his total career receptions to 111 for 1,664 yards, ranking fourth in K-State history in pass receptions, and third in yardage received.

▶ BIG 12 CHAMPIONSHIP GAME

Houston Astrodome offers best financial bid

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Houston Astrodome is offering the best overall financial package for a Big 12 football title game, and Arrowhead Stadium is offering the next best, a published report said Sunday.

The 12 schools are projected to get about $684,000 each if the conference chooses the Astrodome for its inaugural football championship, tentatively scheduled for Dec. 7, 1996, the Kansas City Star said.

The deal offered by Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, where the Big 8's offices are, involves a projected profit of about $628,000 per school, the Star said.

The Big 12's athletic directors examined the bids last month, the newspaper said.

Third among the bids was the Trans World Dome in St. Louis, offering about $605,000 to each school. The Alamodome in San Antonio projected $578,000.

Texas Stadium in Irving, Texas, provided the lowest expected distribution at $574,000 per school, but that could climb once officials determine a value for luxury suites and parking, the newspaper said.

Other bids also contain items of undetermined value, which could boost their profit potential. But the Astrodome's offer was the clear financial leader in bid summaries reviewed by the athletic directors at their Sept. 19-21 meetings in Dallas.

Hatchell warned against drawing quick conclusions from the projected figures.

"We're asking people to make sure the money is really there," he said. "We believe we're going to end up with several cities that are going to pay about the same."

The conference's 12 school presidents have the final decision and should choose a site no later than when they gather Nov. 30 for two days of meetings in Kansas City.

"The approval for a championship game could come at any time," Hatchell said. "The ADs have to sign off. Once the (presidents) are briefed, they could do it with a conference call."

Wildcats upset No. 16 Colorado

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

The K-State volleyball team took another step forward Saturday, defeating the 16th ranked Colorado Buffaloes 15-10, 15-11, 10-15, 15-4 in Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats (13-2, 1-0 in the Big 8) stepped up big in the first game, coming out with a 4-0 lead. The Cats never trailed in the first, a game Coach Jim Moore said may have been the most important of the match.

"If we didn't win the first game, I thought we'd lose in three," Moore said. "That was my thought for two reasons. One is that would give them a lot of momentum. And we've been such a slow-starting team that if we can't win the first game, I was going to be really concerned about that.

"But we were able to win the first game."

Though CU scored first in the second, the Cats again took an early lead, moving to 4-1 following a dink by senior Jill Dugan.

But the Buffs rallied, tying the game at 4-4. From there both teams exchanged points, with neither able to take control until the score tied again at 11-11. The Cats then took control and won the next four points to take the game 15-11.

Though Colorado's hitting percentage was a respectable .245 during the second game, they gave up nine points, including seven of K-State's first 10, on errors.

The Buffs came back in the third game, winning 15-10 aided by poor hitting and a tentative approach by the Cats.

"We were very very tentative, especially early, and you could really tell," Moore said.

"We had been serving so well all night long and making it difficult for their swing hitters to come out and hit. And Val Phillips and Kate DeClerk had been serving so well going down the line, not trying to hit the line, but they missed both their serves early. And that's when I knew we were playing real precise, just playing not to lose."

But K-State rebounded in game four, jumping ahead to a 7-0 lead en route to a 15-4 victory. The Cats controlled the final game, hitting .306 as a team.

"We just kept saying in game four, 'play to win, play to win, play to win,'" Moore said.

Offensively, K-State was led by junior Yolanda "Toie" Young's 22 kills. Dugan added 19, freshman Kim Zschau had 14, DeClerk had 12 and sophomore Devon Ryning had 10.

Ryning, a setter, led the team with 61 assists, but her attacks stand out.

"In transition, we felt we could dump against them, use a setter dump. And she did that pretty effectively," Moore said.

Ryning said that style of attack is new to her.

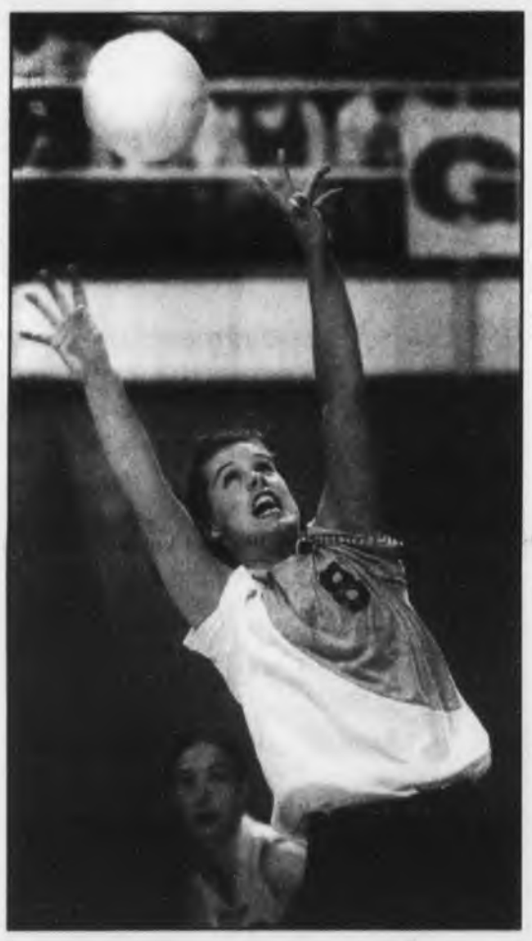
"I had never dumped a lot in games before," Moore said. "I didn't want them to start camping, setting double blocks in the middle. So I knew if that was going to happen I had to dump it a lot so they would only have one blocker up. I was just lucky. It just came to me."

Ryning also led the team in digs with 22. Dugan recorded 17, DeClerk had 16 and Phillips had 11.

Though the Cats snapped a 14-match losing streak to Colorado, Ryning said the team was keeping the win in perspective.

"We celebrate it today, and then it's over," Ryning said. "It's nice to win the big one, but it's over. If we had lost this one, it wouldn't have changed our end-of-the-season goal, but it's a nice game to win. It just shows that we took another step. But we celebrate it tonight, then it's over."

Moore said the team can't be satisfied if they want to continue to improve.



"It's a step. The biggest thing is I never want to go backwards. We need to slowly step up, and we need to get better," Moore said.

In their next action, the Cats will face Iowa State at 7:30 Wednesday night in Ahearn.

Women 2nd, men 5th in OSU Jamboree

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Running short-handed, the K-State women's cross country team made a good showing, finishing second Saturday at the OSU Jamboree in Stillwater, Okla.

But the men didn't fare as well, although K-State cross country coach Terry Drake was running his top nine runners. The men finished a distant fifth, 86 points behind winner Oklahoma State.

Despite the second-place finish, Drake said he was not impressed with the women's results.

"I don't think the women ran that great," Drake said. "We made progress forward, but we're taking little steps."

Senior Irma Betancourt finished eighth, followed by freshman Cristy Swartz 17th, junior Samantha McNamara 21st and sophomore Ashlie Kinton 24th. Drake said Betancourt might have finished better had she not been fighting a calf injury.

"She's had a sore calf, and she was leading the race until the hills. But her calf hurt so much running down the hills. She did what she could," Drake said.

The women were running without sophomore Charity Swartz, who missed the race because of illness, and junior Kay Mannebach, who is out for the season with a stress fracture.

"They took X-rays on Friday, and they could see the break on the X-ray," Drake said of Mannebach. "It hurts to keep losing your upperclassmen and have to depend on your freshmen."

Baylor won the women's division with 33 points, well ahead of K-State's 72. OSU was third with 77 points.

On the men's side, junior Ryan Clive-Smith was K-State's top finisher, taking 21st. Juniors John Thorpe and David Dominguez finished 27th and 31st, respectively.

Drake said he was less than pleased with the men's finish.

"I wasn't really happy with it," Drake said. "It wasn't awful, it just wasn't really outstanding."

Both teams get next weekend off before traveling to the NCAA premeet in Ames, Iowa, on Oct. 16.

the department would have to increase ticket prices to compensate for lost revenue if the fee was made user only,

"We'd have to really jack up the prices," Urick said. "I don't want to increase student ticket prices."

Football and men's basketball are the only revenue sports at K-State. The ticket prices were set during the last fee review in 1994.

Student season football tickets are $7 per game, and men's season basketball tickets are $5 per game, he said.

Fee money is used to support all non-revenue varsity athletics and athletic clubs, Urick said.

Including the money from the fee that is given to the band and the sports clubs, the student fee money makes up about five percent of the athletic department budget.

"Last year the fee totaled $568,340," Urick said.

The K-State Marching Band, sports clubs, non-revenue varsity sports, men and women's basketball, men and women's track, football, baseball and volleyball all received percentages from the fee.

Going to a user-fee system would add an element of instability to the non-revenue and club sports, Urick said. They are the true beneficiaries of the fee money, he said.

Club sports get eight percent of the fee money, and non-revenue varsity sports get a total of 67 percent of the fee money.

"We have the lowest budget in the Big 8," he said. "We have the lowest fee of all the conference schools and some schools outside the conference."

K-State athletic budget is $10.5 million this year. Oklahoma's budget is the highest in the Big 8 at more than $20 million.

Urick said the department wants an increase in its budget so it can compete with other schools in the league.

Urick said he would be making presentations to student groups and administrators. He said he hopes to keep moving the program ahead.

"I certainly don't want to go backward," he said.

Fee cost comparisons

Student tickets for football and men's basketball games are subsidized by the student athletic fee, which makes them cheaper than general admission tickets. With user fees, only students who buy tickets for the games would have to pay to support athletic programs, but prices would not be subsidized by the privilege fee. Here is a ticket price comparison.

| | Student privilege fee subsidy | General public |
|---|---|---|
| Football tickets | $7 | $20 |
| Basketball tickets | $5 | $14.50 |

User fees could affect jobs

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

User fees could affect student employment at Bramlage Coliseum and raise football and basketball ticket prices.

The student fee that helps support Bramlage is up for review by Student Senate this year.

Some student senators want to change some student fees to user fees, which means only students who use services would pay for them.

In a user fee system, the $1 Bramlage maintenance fee would only be paid by students who attend events at Bramlage, including ball games and concerts.

There is no set plan for how a user fee would be carried out. It could be included in ticket prices or students who do not attend events might be refunded at a certain point in the semester.

The $1 Bramlage fee is used for building maintenance, Charlie Thomas, Bramlage director, said.

"That's the promise I made to student government," he said.

Thomas said he can account for every dollar of the fee money. One of the biggest expenses has been maintenance on the box units on the roof, he said.

The student fee is a small part of the Bramlage budget.

"The portion that the student fee would represent is 7.5 percent," Thomas said.

On average, the fee totals between $32,000 and $35,000 per year. If only the students who attend ball games or concerts at Bramlage were charged the maintenance fee, the amount of money would decrease.

If the Bramlage fee became a user fee, Thomas said he would have to come up with the money somewhere else, possibly by hiring fewer students.

"That means the money would have to come from somewhere else," Thomas said.

"There's just no way of telling where it would come from."

Until the fee is actually cut, Thomas said he would not know how he would make up for such a loss.

"You have to really take a hard look at what you're doing," he said.

If money was taken away from maintenance, it would have to be made up somewhere else in the budget.

"I'm afraid the user fee may be more painful than the student fee," Thomas said.

The Bramlage fee will come up for review sometime later this semester, said Mark Tomb, Senate Privilege Fee Committee chairman.

Tomb said he expects the Bramlage fee to be less controversial than many of the other fees, although when it started, the fee was very controversial.

"Students played a significant role in the building of Bramlage, and they continue to do so," Tomb said.

BEER

cars were turned back, warned or ticketed for alcohol.

Of about 100 cars that went through a gate on the east side of the stadium, two people who had beer in cups were asked to pour it out. A group of people in another vehicle asked if the policy was being enforced, and one pickup was stopped because it had a trash can in the back, which are often used to ice kegs of beer. The trash can turned out to be empty.

Lunsway said parking officers, who are mostly students, were in charge of enforcing the policy at the stadium gates.

Several parking officers said they were not allowed to talk to the press about the policy, however, they said if alcohol was seen they would look the other way.

K-State police officers were in charge of patrolling the lot.

Randi Warren, parking cashier supervisor, said people are becoming informed about the policy.

She said she was not aware of any kegs that were found in vehicles entering the stadium parking lots this year. However, she said people could be hiding kegs in vans.

Bill Boyle, officer with the K-State Police Department, worked the Saturday's game and said the force collected a list of people with alcohol and was calling them into the station.

"This is your final warning," he said.

Tickets given to Wildcat fans will be issued under state ordinances 41-717, which is for adults consuming alcohol, and 41-727, which is for minors consuming in public and their providers.

If the police issue tickets to loyal fans, who have supported K-State football, it would not be worth it, Hannibal Hayes, a Manhattan resident, said.

"It will piss a bunch of people off," he said.

Shelly Neumann, 1983 K-State alumna, has been coming to K-State football games since she was a student at K-State and the Wildcats were losing. She said alcohol and tailgating has always been a part of K-State football.

"It's a party situation. It is a part of supporting the team. It's part of the atmosphere — the pregame celebration," she said.

Neumann said she had seen police officers in the parking lots enforcing the policy this season. She said the key to not getting caught was cups.

"They only seem to be going after people with cans and bottles. We all have cups so we're OK. They make you hide it because they are worried about their image," she said as she cradled a cup containing something brown, fizzy and had the aroma of something a little stronger than Coke.

A man next to her, also holding a plastic cup, said he might stop coming to the games if the police started enforcing the alcohol policy.

"I'll just go to the bar and listen to it on the radio," he said.

Jeff, another tailgater in the group two stalls down from Neumann, said two police officers had asked them earlier in the day to throw away three cans of full beer. No one was given a ticket.

"They have had this rule for 26 years. Why are they just enforcing it now," he said as another fellow tailgater poured a can of beer into a large plastic cup.

Tonny Sol, 1990 alumnus, said he didn't understand why alcohol was allowed in the press box but not in the parking lot.

"Don't oppress us poor people," he said.

On the west side of the stadium, Dean Becker, a past president of the alumni association, held a can of beer in his hand and said beer is part of the football tradition.

"Beer is a part of the entire afternoon. It adds to the ambiance of the event," he said.

The smell of broiling burgers and spilt beer hung the air outside of the stadium. Becker said having beer and hamburgers before a football game is American.

"Beer is as an American symbol like apple pie. You have apple pie, the flag and now a Coors Light or a Bud regular," he said.

Even some of the people who were not drinking said they disagreed with the alcohol policy.

John Trygg, a tailgater, said he thought as long as people don't get out of hand, they should be allowed to drink.

He said hadn't seen any police officers in the lot enforcing the policy and even if police would patrol the lot, drinkers would be hard to catch.

"Look at those people over there. They have cups. You can't tell what they are drinking," he said.

Jane Scoville, a K-State alumna, said she thought banning alcohol in the parking lots might reduce the number of people driving under the influence and maybe save someone's life.

"I think it is a good idea," she said. "The game gets out, and its evening, and people have been out here drinking liquor all day. People who are drinking should not be driving."

The family said they didn't have a problem with the alcohol policy.

"We don't bring alcohol mainly because we're here with our kids," Sherri Wood said. "But we do have plenty of pop and a big bottle of water."

NO FEES

tem, was approved for the University of Kansas and K-State by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Many students could refrain from taking classes that are needed because they will not pay extra fees for those classes, he said.

About 30-40 classes could be affected by the decision of the task group, Foster said.

The task force plans to work closely with Faculty Senate because it is responsible for course numbers and credit hours, he said.

A proposal from the group must be finalized by the end of the semester to list the zero credit courses in the class schedule, which the University begins work on in December, Foster said.

Co-curricular activities such as staff writer for the Collegian, Student Senate, the debate team and varsity athletics are possible activities that might fall under the plan, Foster said.

Representatives from Academic Dean's Office, Dean of Student Life Office, University Controller's Office, Financial Aid Office, University Registrar's Office and the Student Governing Association are involved in the task force.

Foster has worked with the registrar from the University of Kansas to help comprise a list of issues that both universities need to address.

One plan to solve the problem is to allow students to take co-curricular courses for credit and pay the fees for the class or choose the no credit and no fees option.

Classes could still be recorded on students' transcripts if this plan is used.

"The real question is whether that's something we want to do to encourage kids to take those classes," said Keith Ratzloff, controller and member of the task group.

Soldner said he agrees with the no credit plan but he said more needs to be done.

"I think it's something we should examine, but I don't think it's the whole solution," he said.

The task force will also consider adopting an extra-curricular transcript to compliment the academic transcript and address drop/add under the new fee system, Soldner said.

Linear fees will demand the administration to have refunds for students who drop classes. With the fee system in place now, no refunds are needed unless a student drops out of all classes or drops to part-time status.

The task force will also be looking at how the University will decide how much financial aid a student will receive in the beginning of each semester, Soldner said.

Students' fees will vary from the beginning of the semester to what they end up with under the new linear fee system.

The group will also look at long-term solutions to the problem such as a possible activities transcript to complement the academic transcripts, Foster said.

The group will then present its findings to Coffman and Krause for the final decision, Foster said.

The task force meetings are open to students and usually take place at 9 a.m. Mondays at the K-State Student Union, Soldner said.

Relatives congregate to experience football and a taste of K-State

by Jeremy Crabtree

A line of people wrapped around the first floor of the K-State Student Union Saturday as K-State families waited to get a picture with Willie the Wildcat.

Willie was just one of the many attractions for K-State families during Family Weekend.

Families toured the campus and trekked out to KSU Stadium to watch the Wildcats whip Northern Illinois 44-0.

Attendance at KSU Stadium was more than 38,000, which is the largest crowd for a home game so far this season.

"We had a lot of people that just wanted to come for the football game," said Becky Klingler, director of the constituent programs for the KSU Alumni Association and Family Weekend organizer. "In that area, we had a lot more people than we've had in the past."

The weekend kicked off Friday night with a pig roast dinner in the Union Main Ballroom.

Saturday morning the Union was full of families waiting for pictures with Willie and picking up their Family Weekend packets.

"This is a pretty big deal. I like how it's organized," said Deborah Benisch, mother of freshman Trent Benisch. "It's really nice, and I'm glad that they have given us the opportunity to come up here."

From there the families ventured out on their own to visit the different activities on campus.

"Family Weekend is nice, because you can do whatever you want to do without interfering with other people's plans," said Carolyn Lafoon, mother of junior Angie Lafoon. "It's a very nice layout. I'm glad that we came here to see this."

The most popular activity on campus this weekend was the Taste of K-State.

At the Taste of K-State, families were able to go to Shellenberger Hall and taste the bread products. Then they could go to Call Hall and taste meat and cheese products.

Gary Lindsly, father of junior Katy Lindsly, said he enjoyed the tour.

"Personally, I went for the bread first," Lindsly said, while holding up a fresh loaf he was planning to take home with him.

"Fresh bread is the best out of everything here. It's fabulous."

A Taste of the Internet was another top attraction this weekend.

Families were able to learn how important the Internet is, along with seeing how people from around the world are accessing information about K-State on the World Wide Web.

"Everything went very, very well," Klingler said.

"There were no problems at all," she said. "This weekend is as close to perfect as it can get."

Hands-on activities highlight ROTC program

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

Paintball wars, rapelling and target ranges were just a few events set up by the K-State ROTC for Family Weekend.

The weekend gave the ROTC members an opportunity to show students and family members what they do and what they're trying to accomplish with the program.

"It gives people a chance to meet us and see some of the things that we work on," Maj. George Stelljes, professor of military science, said.

Parents of cadets have a special interest in the activities planned by the ROTC, he said.

"Parents are curious about what their kids do," Stelljes said. "They have a chance to watch videotapes, see the rifle range and get to sample various foods."

Rapelling allows people to try things they normally would not have an opportunity to do, he said.

"Rapelling is as safe as riding a bicycle," Stelljes said. "People are terrified at first, but once they've done it they love it."

Most people who tried the rapelling said they agreed that it was a lot easier than it looks when you watch other people scaling down the wall.

"It was pretty fun and really easy," Dan Bass, brother of a K-State student, said.

K-State is one of the only ROTC units that allows people to experience simulated situations, Stelljes said.

"We're one of the few units that have hands-on events," said Darrel Link, member of ROTC and senior in management. "It's a great chance for people to see some of the things that we work on."

In addition to the main events, students and family members were also able to view weapons used by ROTC members, try on various combat clothing and taste foods used in the field.

Family Weekend also gave the ROTC an opportunity to show people why it is considered to be one of the finest programs in the country.

"We've won the award for the best ROTC unit in Kansas for the last three years, and we've been chosen as the best brigade in the Kansas, Arkansas and Oklahoma area for the last two years," Stelljes said. "Some consider us the best brigade west of the Mississippi."

Guitars make for erotic music

contributing writer

Despite a sparse turn out Thursday night at Club Berlin, Manhattan's Ultimate Fake Book and Kansas City's Sacrifice Isaac might as well have been playing to a full house, considering the positive flailability of the show.

UFB headlined with the return of their stray drummer, the Animal Muppet look-alike, Mött Waldmann.

Waldmann said this time his UFB brotherhood is for keeps.

"Before we were always on different wavelengths," Waldmann said. "I was set in wanting to do more metal, so I've quit and come back many times. But finally I'm certain that as long as I'm here there will be some element of metal that can be incorporated in the music.

"My priorities have changed," he said. "We're all on the same wavelength now, and we want to make this our life. We don't want day jobs."

The reunion could not upstage the untamable and spotlight-thirsty bass tantrums of Nick Colby, which seemed more prominent than in past performances by UFB.

Another element that deserves mention is the uninhibited compulsion of the soul-absorbing, warped splash-of-the-guitar-isms of Bill McShane.

When vocalist Jeremy Pontow joined McShane on rhythm guitar, the result was the explosive and potent exchange of two fornicating guitars and a deeper percussive consumption, culminating in a highly erotic electronic orchestra.

"We're at the bubbling point," Colby said. "We're on the edge of one of those creative times where we either get on with it, or were dead meat."

Already a striking difference in UFB's more audibly legible material is a drifting, consuming combination of more intricate harmonies and the band's notoriously contagious mosaic of splintering, slinking riffs. Look for the band to play Manhattan again.

Sacrifice Isaac opened the show, creating a primitive and cranky foreplay that presented a more typical and generic thrashish brew.

The band is trying to build a following in the Kansas and Missouri region.

Band members said they hope to get away from some of the typical power trips inherent in the Kansas City music scene. Vocalist Bill Mitchell said it is much like the cliqueishness of Lawrence.

"Some of the bands with the least talent have the biggest mouths," he said. "Still, the more bands, the better. The smart bands are not about being egotistical about their craft, and the smart bands can teach the others."

Like UFB, the band is committed to a permanent residence in the unstable and rough-tumble cycle of the music business.

"We just want to play," Paul Mitchell, guitarist said. "Even if we can only half-ass support ourselves — we're not looking for a million dollars.

"If I have to live on peanut butter and jelly to stay on the road, I'll do it if that's what it takes to keep playing."

Brush Creek: $86 million and still a sewer

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas City leaders and the Army Corps of Engineers had hoped to transform an open sewer into a waterfront showpiece and a point of civic pride.

Instead, Brush Creek has become a public relations nightmare, the butt of jokes, and a public works project that could cost taxpayers an extra $100 million to deliver as advertised.

Officials now realize the $86 million undertaking, two-thirds complete, suffers from one major flaw: Brush Creek is still an open sewer.

"To be sure, I am still excited about what this project can mean to the tourism industry and, frankly, to the spirit of Kansas City," Mayor Emanuel Cleaver told the Kansas City Star last week. "You convert a ditch into a diamond, and it makes people feel like they live in a can-do city. But we obviously were premature in launching this project."

Officials and consultants acknowledge they underestimated and understudied the effect sewage could have on a streamside esplanade complete with gondolas, waterborne restaurants and bars, and other amenities.

They knew the real solution — a $100 million project to separate the sanitary and storm sewers — was too expensive to consider.

The Star's interviews and examination of government records shows the city's quick-fix approach to dealing with the sewage — including recirculating the water, aerating it with fountains and waterfalls and conducting routine maintenance of the combined sewers — was inadequate and based on several false assumptions.

"There was always an underlying question of whether or not the solutions were really going to solve the problems," said Gurnie Gunter, director of the city's Water Services Department. "At that time, we really didn't know enough. We honestly believed there would be varying degrees of water quality in there but that it would not be unacceptable."

But so far, it is.

At the creek, city officials last month turned down the towering fountains and shelved plans for boat rentals, fishing and other water-related activities after state officials warned that the high levels of raw sewage created a health and environmental threat.

In City Hall, a task force of various city departments met for the first time last week to look for solutions to what has become a public embarrassment.

Officials who initially discounted reports of a possible health threat now acknowledge they can no longer guarantee the safety of people who come in contact with the water.

For decades, much of central Kansas City's sewers have emptied into Brush Creek. The 75-year-old sewer system carries sanitary sewage along with storm water in the same pipes downstream to the Blue River Treatment Plant.

"Everybody knew the sewers were combined," said Bob Dimmitt, Brush Creek project engineer for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. "I guess they didn't realize the sewers were leaking all the time and the problem it would become. I didn't realize it would be leaking in dry weather."

Still, the corps accepted the city's assurances that fountains and recirculation would take care of water quality, Dimmitt said.

Gunter said officials plan to take a year to study the creek to gain a better understanding of the problem. He acknowledges the work should have been done years ago.

"If we had to do it all over again we would have started worrying earlier," he said.

"We should have been better prepared to deal with it when the project was finished."

Innocent inmate released

Associated Press

AURORA, Mo. — Johnny Lee Wilson slept late, watched pro wrestling and reacquainted himself with family and friends Saturday, his first day of freedom since winning a pardon after spending 8-1/2 years in prison for a murder he didn't commit.

"I just want to spend some time with my family and stay right where I'm at for a while," he said.

A cheering crowd welcomed Wilson home following his release from the state prison in Jefferson City. Gov. Mel Carnahan pardoned Wilson, saying investigators manipulated the mentally retarded man into confessing to a crime he didn't commit — the 1986 slaying of 79-year-old Pauline Martz.

Wilson, 30, stopped for a Big Mac and fries, then rode back to his Ozarks hometown of 6,500 in a motor home with relatives and friends. He wiped away tears as he exchanged hugs and handshakes with about 200 supporters.

"I never thought I had many friends," he said. "But arriving home and realizing how many people were there, it was the most marvelous day of my life."

Wilson was 20 when Martz, a close friend and bridge partner of his grandmother, was found beaten, bound and gagged in her burned house. Wilson was arrested five days later. He was eventually sentenced to life in prison without a chance for parole.

Wilson later professed his innocence.

Charges that his confession was coerced and that Kansas inmate Chris Brownfield confessed to the crime in 1988 helped bring the case national attention.

Wilson said he still doesn't know why he confessed.

He has an IQ of 76 and low verbal skills.

"I didn't think the governor would do it," Wilson said of the pardon.

"But when it actually came through, I was really shocked. He's a great man. I thank him a lot."

'Okra' story hits audience in heart, head

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Labeling the central relationship in Ebony Theatre Co.'s "From Okra to Greens: A Different Kinda Love Story" as a love story is sometimes difficult to understand.

The play was performed Sept. 28-30 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Viewing the events through the eyes of Okra, played by Vivian Ferguson, junior in theater, offers an empathetic seat to the emotional bruises of abuse.

Consumed with her desire for Greens, played by Billy Williams, sophomore in art, Okra succumbs to his seduction. Soon after, she hears the first rings of verbal abuse.

Greens, in an effort to tie her down, pressures her for a child.

Though Ferguson's performance personifies keen intelligence and fiery strength, she allows herself to live with the belief that some men don't know a language that doesn't hurt.

The abuse eventually elevates to marital rape and then neglect during which time Greens tastes of " ... numerous vegetables in the garden," as he put it.

Williams' charm and on-stage swagger is captivating as he speaks of trying to fill bigger-than-life expectations.

Instead, he falls into the pitfalls of a pretty man with pretty things. His critically pointed speeches show the enticing allusion of allowing such a small man to get by with so much.

The central questions extracted from the language of this production center on how Okra finds the root of herself and is able to transcend such injustices and forge ahead.

As with the rhythmic poetry of Ntozake Shange, each surface question alludes to one of political or social importance.

In a sparsely-decorated stage, three dancers helped the audience to visualize the intense symbolism of Shange's language.

The performances of Donna Davenport and Aundray Collins, both freshmen in theater, and Erin Mansur-Smith, graduate student in speech, educate and emotionally move the audience.

A stirring look at the forgotten women in Haiti's recent military situation and the screaming anguish of the Alabama child murders sent ripples of compassion and tears through the Purple Masque Theatre.

Though the sexual content is almost overpowering, it is the honest but explicit language of "From Okra to Greens" that shocks.

Director Jeneena Hubbard, senior in music, chose a piece intent on arousing compassion for the plight of a woman discovering her identity and purpose through intensely unjust obstacles.

The beauty and significance of Shange's poetry during this one-act play continuously struck cords of universal truth.

Although the motivation of the love story might be difficult to understand, it would be impossible for one to leave such a performance and not be touched by the thought-provoking material.

Bike fair slated to boost registration

▶ You still need to register your bike by Nov. 1, and Parking Services has scheduled an All-University Bike Fair for Oct. 6.

Trina Holmes
staff reporter

Parking Services is sticking with its Nov. 1 deadline for bike registration and has scheduled a bike fair to promote registration.

The All-University Bike Fair has been scheduled for Oct. 6.

The fair, which will be from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the free-speech zone between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall, was one item of business discussed at the Council on Parking Operations' meeting Thursday.

Dwain Archer, director of Parking Services, said the council plans to pitch a tent and hang a banner to draw people to the fair.

He also said the council plans to have area vendors display their wares and have Parking Service officials and members of the bike patrol on hand to answer any questions participants might have.

Although the event is designed to boost registration, Archer said the response has already been strong.

"We've been doing really well with bike registration," he said. "We've had 600 or maybe 650 register, which is excellent for not putting much effort into going out and finding people or putting the sales in a location that is really good."

Darell Edie, parking council chairman, said he hoped to get Campus Bike Club members involved in the fair.

"It would be a great time for them to get new members and become visible on campus," he said.

Tentatively, two registration dates might be added on Oct. 11 and Oct. 25. Archer said with the addition of these dates, students shouldn't have any reason to miss the Nov. 1 registration deadline.

"We're giving students the chance to register three separate times between now and Nov. 1," Archer said. "That should be enough time and enough opportunity."

Edie said moving the registration deadline back would not be an impossibility, but the original amendment that set the deadline at Nov. 1 would have to be brought back up for reconsideration.

"It would have to be brought up by an individual who voted for the amendment originally," he said.

"Then, there would have to be a two-thirds majority vote to change it. It's not impossible at all."

Another bicycle-related topic was brought up by committee member Phillip Anderson.

Anderson informed the council that some misconceptions were being brought to him by students in his classes about the bike registration.

"There's a cynicism about whether or not the bike registration will remain free," he said. "There's a cynicism about how the bureaucracy will trick everyone into registering their bikes and then pounce on them with a fee."

Anderson suggested adding a seventh principle to the six current principles of parking, detailing the bicycle registration question.

"I think we should consider adding to our list of principles of parking that in order to encourage bike usage we will provide free bike registration," he said.

"If we do that, it's a signal to the campus that they needn't be cynical — that they can register their bikes and not be afraid to do it."

Another concern was raised about the amount of short-term metered parking in the Union once construction on the building begins in January 1997.

Archer said he didn't see there being much of a problem because only 25 percent of the Union metered spaces are expected to be taken up by the Union construction.

"Parking should still be the same way it is now. Everyone has to park farther and farther away," he said. "We keep building new buildings and not new parking. It doesn't take a mathematician to see we are going to run out of places to park."

Leading back into the bicycle issue, Archer said overcrowding could become a problem in the future. This was one reason the bicycle registration had been implemented.

"The idea of the bicycle registration is like responding with an RSVP for a party," he said. "If you tell me you're coming, I can have things to serve you. If you don't tell me, I run short on resources. This is one of the reasons we're asking people to register their bicycles."

'SNL' cast stale, trapped in 1970s

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Nations come and go. The hundred-dollar bill gets a fresh new look. Then there's "Saturday Night Live," hopelessly stuck in the past.

What about all the grand talk of bringing this 1970s relic into the '90s, of reinventing it for the new season?

Sadly, that was "Saturday Night" jive.

That's the disappointing news from NBC's Studio 8H, where "SNL" launched its much-awaited, supposedly do-or-die 21st season Saturday night, with Mariel Hemingway as guest host.

The program served as an apt warm-up for the 1996 presidential campaign: empty promises of change. From the O.J. Simpson sketch where "Judge Ito" orders lawyer "Johnnie Cochran" to declare, "Live from New York ...!," to the self-congratulating group huddle as the final credits roll, Saturday's show was "SNL" business as usual.

After all the hype, was it too much to hope for at least one genuine surprise during the long, long 90 minutes? In retrospect, yes.

Oh, and was "SNL" even funny in its season opener?

Not so you'd notice.

If anyone from producer Lorne Michaels on down really believes this is a different show from last April — or April 1976 — they're delusional. Sure, there are new people on board, but the show is the same old heap with just another coat of paint, traveling the same road, stuck in the same ruts.

Of course, this is hardly the first time Michaels has promised great things and failed to deliver. In fact, year after year he's like Lucy in the "Peanuts" strip, swearing she'll hold the football. The viewer is Charlie Brown, always falling for it.

This time, the only auspicious sign comes from the freshman class of repertory players. Although it's premature to rate the six rookies, one of them, Darrell Hammond, is clearly a welcome addition, thanks to his impersonation skills (his was a dead-on Ted Koppel in an otherwise limp "Nightline" send-up).

Norm MacDonald, anchoring a weak "Weekend Update," had the crickets chirping.

So-so was a commercial parody for A.M. Ale ("Because you can't wait 'til afternoon"). Right after came a real, and far stranger, commercial for Budweiser.

The show's brightest elements? Musical guest Blues Traveler, which traveled in at the last minute to sub for the dropout formerly known as Prince, and Hemingway, who displayed an unexpected gift for comedy. Neither, of course, will be back soon enough.

Chevy Chase is next week's guest host. Now there's a fresh idea!

▶ DEBATE TEAM

Cooperation, research key to success

Gina Buster
staff reporter

Hundreds of hours spent researching have begun to pay off for the K-State debate team.

The debate teams are arguing the resolution that the United States should substantially change its foreign policy toward Mexico, and an area of concentration for improvement this past week has been research.

"We spent a lot of time researching our assignments, such as population growth and impact, hazardous waste and AIDS. Last weekend, we found that we had a difficult time when we went negative. There were affirmative cases we weren't prepared for," Lori Davis, sophomore in speech communication, said.

Susan Stanfield, speech instructor and debate coach, said there were areas they hadn't anticipated people debating, but the team's research had been solid.

"We were more prepared research-wise than other people, and we had fewer holes than other squads," she said.

"We just need to continue to research our areas and practice," Stanfield said.

Davis said one nice thing about the Johnson County Community College tournament was the amount of time between rounds.

"This tournament was nice because there was a lot of time in between rounds, so we could talk with our coaches," Davis said.

"We would go through our strategies with the coaches before the rounds and decide what would be the best way to answer other team's arguments," she said.

The debate team swept first and second place in varsity division at Johnson County Community College Sept. 23.

Sarah Glaser, freshman in chemical engineering, and Brent Siemers, senior in economics, tied with Davis and Grant Denny, sophomore in political science and speech communication, for first place.

To avoid two K-State teams debating against each other, each team's points for the day were tallied to determine the first-place winner.

Top seeds Glaser and Siemers took first place.

"It was a real positive weekend in Kansas City," Siemers said.

"It's nice to go to a tournament at the beginning of the year and do well early on," he said.

One of the strong points for this year's debate team is its ability to work together.

"We all work together as a team. Everyone's very motivated, and we all did a lot of research and contributed a lot," Siemers said.

K-State's final varsity team spent the weekend at the South Carolina Round Robin instead of competing at JCCC, Stanfield said.

Courtney Knapple, junior in speech communication, and Isaac West, sophomore in speech communication and history, posted a 5-2 record to advance to the elimination round.

Overall, Stanfield said she was excited about everyone's performance in the team's first competition of the season.

"I was very pleased that everyone placed, especially in that first tournament. They are doing very well. This was a great starting weekend," Stanfield said.

The K-State debate team travels to Southwest Missouri State, Oct. 7 - 9.

▶ DETROIT NEWSPAPERS

17 arrested as strike escalates

Associated Press

DETROIT — Police and guards clashed with picketers outside two Detroit Newspapers distribution centers early Sunday, and at least 17 people were arrested.

"Obviously things have escalated," Benny Napoleon, deputy police chief, said. "We've had several fires, several incendiary devices explode. Things are definitely getting a little more heated, no question."

At least two officers suffered minor injuries when they were struck by picket signs, and the union said four protesters were injured.

The clashes followed peaceful protests late Saturday at two printing plants. Last weekend, police dismantled a homemade bomb outside a distribution center.

Six unions representing 2,500 employees went on strike July 13 after management refused to extend contracts during negotiations. Detroit Newspapers oversees business operations at the Detroit News, owned by Gannett Co. Inc., and the Detroit Free Press, owned by Knight-Ridder Inc.

The main issues are wages and staffing levels.

The newspapers are publishing with managers, replacement workers and employees who have crossed the picket lines.

Most of those arrested early Sunday were accused of malicious destruction of property, police officer Fatima Cotton said.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Working It Out

What would you do if you knew of an activity that would: bolster your self esteem, help you sleep better, give you more energy, control your weight, help you cope with stress and give you a chance to meet other people? These are just some of the benefits of aerobic exercise. Make Wildcat Workouts part of your regular schedule and start enjoying these benefits.

Who's Who at Recreational Services

Dan Watkins, native of Omaha, Neb., is a head lifeguard for Recreational Services. This is his third year as a lifeguard for the department. "I feel swimming is the best cardiovascular exercise for a person," he said, "it is better and easier on your body in general, than for example running." Dan, a senior in business and education, played club soccer for K-State the past three years. Now he is the assistant coach for Manhattan High Soccer. Following graduation he plans to pursue his master's degree in education and sport administration at Wichita State University.

Lanell Blubaugh, senior in kinesiology, is starting her first year as an exercise leader for Recreational Services. A native of McPherson, Kan., Lanell enjoys choreographing and organizing aerobic routines. "I want to incorporate what I am learning at school with what I am doing in my aerobic classes," she said. Lanell has always liked dancing and physical fitness. Before attending K-State, Lanell was a cheerleader and taught aerobics to other cheerleaders and dancers at a community college. After graduation, Lanell wants to focus on the fitness area of kinesiology by making fitness understandable to the everyday person. "I want to make a bridge between every day work outs and the scientific aspect of fitness," she said.

Pool Action

The decreased impact and increased resistance experienced in water aerobics produces a unique workout. Experience the difference with Wildcat Waterworks: Monday, Tuesday and Thursday at 11:45 a.m. and 7:30 p.m. Deep water jogging sessions are held Wednesdays at 11:30 a.m. and 7:30 p.m.

The first Wednesday's monthly Stroke Mechanics Workshop is October 4 at 8:30 p.m. Swimming instructors will assist you in improving your stroke or planning a workout (this is not a learn to swim program).

The pools will be closed Saturday and Sunday, October 21 and 22, for a swim meet.

Nutrition Notes

Order a baked potato for less calories and lower fat than french fries and more potassium than a banana. A 2 1/2 ounce serving of french fries has nearly 12 times the fat of a 2 1/2 ounce baked potato. One large banana has 450 milligrams of potassium, while a large baked potato with its skin contains about 850 milligrams (the skin alone has about 235 milligrams). The University of California, Berkeley, Wellness Encyclopedia.

Look Out Below!!

Our new volleyball net system lowers from the ceiling automatically by the turn of a key. The new Quick Set volleyball system makes court set up a snap after 15 years of lugging heavy poles and untangling cords. With this new system, only the net height needs to be adjusted. The nets never have to be moved and should not need tightening. Because the nets are never moved, there is very little wear and tear. The first school that has had this type of installation, 15 years ago, is still using the same nets. Once down, a hydraulic plunger anchors the standard to the floor, eliminating the need for holes in the floor. When finished, loosen the plunger, and raise the net back up to the ceiling and out of the way. We look forward to using our new Quick Set volleyball system this season!

My Favorite Workout

Gary Pierson, associate director of new student services and director of orientation, is a veteran user of the Recreational Complex. Even with his busy schedule, Gary works out at least three to four times a week. "Working out is a good way to feel good about yourself," he said, "it is a great outlet for relieving stress." Gary's workouts consist of playing racquetball with friends, lifting weights, or joining a lunch time basketball game. He said, "I feel fortunate to take advantage of the new facilities." Gary also added that the Recreation Complex is far and away the best facility at a college campus for student recreation that he has seen.

K-State remembers Peters

Shana Newell
staff writer

The namesake of K-State's Recreation Complex, Chester E. Peters, died of an apparent heart attack Sunday afternoon. He was 72 years old.

A native of Minneapolis, Kan., Peters was born Oct. 15, 1922. He graduated from Valley Falls High School and was class valedictorian. Peters began his lifelong association with K-State in 1940 as a freshman.

Peters

Not only did he letter in track and football while a business student at K-State, Peters also earned several academic honors awards. He consistently strived for ways to stay in shape and continued to be athletic late into life.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life and associate vice president for institutional advancement, said Peters competed nationally and internationally as a runner in master's competitions throughout the United States, Canada, Germany and Australia. He participated in the mile, the 1,500-meter steeplechase, the 3,000-meter run and race walking.

Raydon Robel, director of the Recreation Complex, said Peters was a regular visitor to the Rec Area.

"He was always out here with his wife, Doris, walking and getting exercise," Robel said.

In 1943, Peters temporarily put his studies on hold when he enlisted in the U.S. infantry. He served more than a year overseas, and was discharged in October, 1946. During those years, he advanced from private to captain.

After completing his wartime obligation, Peters returned to his studies at K-State and received a bachelor of science degree in business administration in 1947. He graduated cum laude.

In 1950, Peters earned his master of science degree in economics and agricultural economics, also from K-State. He then went on to continue his education at the University of Wisconsin where he received his Ph.D. in economics, agricultural economics and administration in 1953.

Peters returned to Manhattan in 1953 and established the Career Planning and Placement Center and was named the organization's first director.

Don Hoyt, former assistant provost and director of planning and evaluation services, said that Peters touched many lives within the K-State community.

"Chet Peters' name lives on in the Recreation Complex, which honors him," Hoyt said. "His spirit lives on in the hearts and minds of the thousands who drew inspiration from him."

"Under his leadership, Kansas State University became more student-centered, more compassionate and more moral. God willing, he will never be forgotten," Hoyt said.

Peters served as the president of the College Placement Council in 1962 and of the National Association of Student Personnel Administrators in 1971.

Simpson jurors meet quickly, decision made

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Refusing to meet O.J. Simpson's gaze, 12 jurors filed back into the courtroom Monday to confirm they had reached verdicts after less than four hours of deliberations, a stunningly swift resolution to a sensational murder trial that took more than eight months to present.

Their decision shocked the courtroom and a nation already busy debating how many weeks the jurors might be out. Superior Court Judge Lance Ito said the verdicts would be read Tuesday at noon CDT.

As the 10 women and two men of the jury filed into court at 4:55 p.m., Simpson stood and stared at them. None looked his way.

The judge then announced the startling news. He said his court clerk told him that the panel had made its decision.

"Is that correct?" he asked.

"Yes," the jury forewoman said.

There were gasps in the hushed courtroom.

Lawyers on both sides seemed almost dazed by the speed of the verdict.

"Surprise doesn't begin to describe my feelings. I am stunned at the speed," defense attorney Carl Douglas said.

Prosecutor Christopher Darden, asked if he could believe the rapid end to deliberations, said, "I think I have to believe it. It's happening. Nothing shocks me anymore."

The announcement came after jurors asked for and heard a brief repetition of testimony from a limousine driver that concerned the time when Simpson was picked up for a ride to the airport on the night of the two murders.

Ito, who had sent jurors from the courtroom after the reading, seemed startled when three loud buzzes sounded in the courtroom, signaling jurors had reached a verdict. He was entertaining a group of visitors in the courtroom when the word came but quickly summoned

Empty Bramlage greets Soul Asylum

Scott Allen Miller
contributing writer

Soul Asylum played its hard pop to a mostly empty Bramlage Coliseum last night.

The Minneapolis-based quartet seemed a little disappointed at the about 1,000-person crowd. Nonetheless, Soul Asylum played its level best.

Manhattan High School was well represented in the crowd last night. Down on the coliseum floor, which was open to anyone with a ticket, the young men and a few young women were surfing the crowd all night.

It didn't matter whether the bands were playing love songs, members of the crowd flung their bodies up into the air, just like all those cool guys in the videos on MTV.

In other words, they would have surfed no matter who was playing. On the floor, they just weren't listening.

It was Lincoln, Neb. native Matthew Sweet who had the challenge of playing to this oblivious crowd. Sweet drew from his critically acclaimed "Altered Beast" album as well as his most recent success, "100% Fun."

He received polite applause, mostly from the older crowd members. Sweet's music has a strong 1960s flavor to it, and his execution was best suited for the more mature listeners.

This was Matthew Sweet's last night with the Soul Asylum tour. Dan Murphy, Soul Asylum guitarist, came onstage and jammed with Sweet and his band during "Divine Intervention." Sweet's show ended with his latest hit, "Sick of Myself," much to the MTV-weened crowd's pleasure.

Soul Asylum kicked its show off with the sassy riff of "Hope's Up,"a song from its latest album, "Let Your Dim Light Shine." The floor crowd, which by this time had the ambience of a class field trip, began to mosh. It was the cool thing to do.

Rowdy fans cheer during Soul Asylum's "Somebody to Shove" Monday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

MTV and local radio stations have played the daylights out of "Grave Dancer's Union" songs "Somebody to Shove" and "Black Gold" over the last few years. The songs' lyrics are imprinted in everyone's minds.

These songs, along with the more recent hits "Just Like Anyone," and "Misery" turned the Soul Asylum set into one big happy sing-along.

The slower, lighter, mellower material of the middle of the show didn't go over very well with the adolescents and the 30-somethings.

They wanted to mosh and play air guitar, not hear insightful, clever songs like "String of Pearls" and "Eyes of a Child."

Members of the crowd on the floor had been waving their arms and swaying to the slower tunes as if to parody them. The only things missing were Bic lighters Soul Asylum finally relented. Singer and guitarist Dave Pirner asked the audience members if they'd rather hear more slow music or some harder tunes. Of course, the harder tunes won out. Soul Asylum blared "99%" and "Crawl" before the off-kilter "Caged Rat" found Pirner playing a muted trumpet. "Just Like Anyone" closed the show.

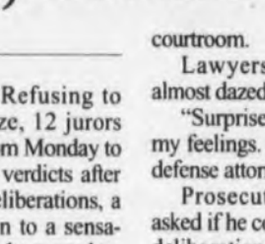
When Soul Asylum returned for encores, Pirner, whose voice and demeanor had shown signs of exhaustion all night, reluctantly asked if the audience wanted to hear "Runaway Train." The audience howled.

The band played their obligatory big hit song but not without beginning and ending it with a parody, "Blah, Blah, Blah."

To celebrate the parting of ways of Matthew Sweet and Soul Asylum, Matthew Sweet and most of his band joined Soul Asylum for a hilariously campy encore of "The Joker," a song released before many audience members were even thought of.

Pirner invited a young man out of the audience named Brian McKinney to join the bands on Glenn Campbell's "Rhinestone Cowboy," an ironically appropriate song for a venue more accustomed to hosting hillbilly guitar pickers wearing big belt buckles than straggly-haired rock waifs.



Perhaps if Soul Asylum had worn bigger belt buckles in their videos more people would have shown up. Or maybe, Union Programming Council should have opened a satellite ticket office in the Manhattan High School principal's office to sell even more tickets.

U.S. debates English as official language

Phil Roberts
staff reporter

In the midst of the American melting pot, citizens are asking for an official national language.

Talk of the adopting English as the official language is supported by groups such as English Only, English First and U.S. English, Tom Murray, English professor, said at a Racial-Ethnic Harmony Week workshop Monday.

"The reason for the debate comes down to fear and dollars and cents," Murray said. "People are afraid of other languages establishing themselves. Of the 1,000 most frequently used words, one-third of them are French. We have all this energy and we're trying to turn those forces against each other, which is wasting energy. We need to take that energy and blend it into a common stream."

Twenty-two states have passed legislation to have English as the official language. More than 75 percent of all people who live in the United States generally favor the English movement.

Citizens of Washington, Oregon and New Mexico have shown preference to the English Plus system, which allows English as the main language in addition to the usage of another language.

"Today's immigrants are learning English faster than any others," Murray said.

Union fee creates controversy

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

The K-State Student Union programming fee is the newest and one of the most controversial of the fees up for review by student government this year.

The $2 fee was created as part of the Union enhancement fee by the Kansas Board of Regents in 1993. The fee was not created by Student Senate.

Senate and the board approved the enhancement plan even though the student referendum failed to receive 60 percent of the vote as required by the Senate Constitution.

"This one is somewhat controversial because of the way it was created," Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said.

Students pay $23 toward Union enhancement and $2 for programming. The regents recommended the original $25 enhancement fee be separated into a $2 programming fee and a $23 fee for enhancement.

Because the programming fee is separate from the bonded enhancement fee, it can be reviewed by Senate and the Privilege Fee Committee.

"They would not have been able to review the program fee because it would have been part of the enhancement project," Patrick Carney, Union Program Council president, said.

The original plan was to put the fee money collected the first year into a special programming account. A total of $70,000 would have been withdrawn annually for programming.

The split fee provides the same amount of programming money, but it has the possibility of being renewed when enhancement is finished. An additional $30,000 for programming is provided by the institutional support fee.

Tomb said there is no doubt programming has increased since the fee was implemented, but he said he saw no reason not to put the fee into a review cycle.

"It's necessary to review it because it's just like any other fee," he said.

Senate did not get the chance to review the fee when it was created because it did not create the fee. The fee was never set on a review cycle, and Tomb said by reviewing it this year, the fee would be set on the appropriate review cycle.

K-STATE'S NEW GRAPHIC-HEAVY HOME PAGE TO BE ON-LINE BY FRIDAY

The new K-State home page could be on-line by the end of this week.

The Webmaster Committee chose the new graphical home page to replace the existing K-State home page on the World Wide Web.

"We will go ahead and use the graphic home page as soon as it's ready," said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic research and technology and chairwoman of the Webmaster Committee.

The committee chose between having the graphic home page come up first and having a page come up that offered both a text home page and the graphic home page.

"Most people will choose the graphical page," said Neil Erdwien, Computing and Network Services employee and page designer.

The text home page loads more quickly than the graphic page on slow connections to the Internet.

The option of going to the text page will be offered on the graphic home page, and the address will be listed so users with slow connections may load the text page the next time they log-on.

Unger also set a schedule for determining the guidelines college and department pages must meet. The committee will discuss those guidelines at the next meeting and hopes to have them established within the next month.

"I'd really like to have K-State's pages be a show piece for us," she said.

Once the guidelines are set, CNS and the Department of Continuing Education will have a seminar in the Union Big 8 Room for webmasters and other personnel who are working with the Web pages to explain the guidelines, Unger said.

MUSLIMS CONVICTED IN BOMBING

NEW YORK (AP) — Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman and nine other militant Muslims were convicted Sunday of conspiring to wage a holy war against the United States with a string of terrorist bombings and assassinations.

One defendant, El Sayyid Nosair, also was convicted of killing extremist Rabbi Meir Kahane in 1990 as part of the larger conspiracy. The assassination was once described as an isolated attack by a crazed gunman but prosecutors later called it the opening blow in a war of urban terrorism.

Security at the nation's airports was tightened Sunday, and the exhausted jurors were shepherded away without commenting to reporters.

Most of the defendants looked on sternly, but one smirked and another repeatedly yelled in Arabic, "God is great," after jurors left the room.

Lawyers for the defendants said all will appeal the verdict, which concluded a nine-month trial that brought more than 200 witnesses and hundreds of exhibits to a heavily guarded Manhattan courthouse.

"Terrorism is real. It is here. It is in this courtroom," Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald told the jury. He also said Abdel-Rahman called the United States the No. 1 enemy of Islam.

The plot's centerpiece was a plan to set off five bombs in 10 minutes, blowing up the United Nations and the FBI's local headquarters as well as tunnels and a bridge into Manhattan.

LAS VEGAS POPULATION GROWS

WASHINGTON (AP) — More people are betting on Las Vegas for jobs and affordable housing than any other metropolitan area in the country.

The Census Bureau reports that the area around the neon-washed center of America's gambling industry grew fastest in the nation between 1990 and 1994 — jumping 26 percent in population, to more than 1 million.

The Census Bureau, as it does every two years, released population totals Monday for the nation's 271 metropolitan areas and its 36,000 cities, towns and places.

Overall metropolitan-area population increased by 9.6 million, or 4.9 percent, and the areas were home to nearly 80 percent of U.S. residents. Population growth outside these areas was 2 million, or 3.9 percent.

BASEBALL FANS LOSE INTEREST

NEW YORK (AP) — As the baseball season ends, six in 10 fans say they have less interest in the sport than before the 7 1/2-month strike, according to an Associated Press poll.

Attendance at ballparks during the regular season is down 19 percent. Some teams are wondering if they can fill stadiums this week for the first playoffs in which each league's best second-place finisher is a wild-card contender, joining the league's three division champions.

Among all adults in the poll, 38 percent plan to follow the World Series closely on television.

Tom Murray, professor of English, speaks to a small crowd about the idea of adopting English as an official national language, during the Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week workshop Monday afternoon in the Union Big 8 Room.

STEVE HEBERT

LANGUAGE

The English language is learned in different cycles by immigrants, he said.

Of the 200 Native American languages, elders are the only people who speak native language, and it is rare to find children speaking their tribal language, he said.

"The first generation seems to cling to their native language. The second generation is becoming more bilingual, using one language for their home and the other for business. The third generation is speaking English only," Murray said.

In 1906, a law was passed that claims people can't become a U.S. citizen unless they know English.

Although the law is in writing, it is commonly ignored, Murray said.

During World War I, German was viewed as the language of evil, and speakers were arrested and accused of being spies.

Today, Hawaii, one of the 22 states to declare an official language, has declared both Hawaiian and English as its official language, Murray said.

Although both languages are official, it is clear the Hawaiian language has been long regarded as honorary to their culture, Murray said.

In California, a vote was taken of citizens about whether to pass legislation making English the official language of the United States, Murray said.

A poll was later conducted, and found the majority of the people who voted did not know what they voted about, and they would not vote the same way if they could vote again.

Panel speaks out on religion

Gina Buster
staff reporter

Respecting others and understanding were reoccurring themes at the Interfaith Dialogue Monday.

"Discrimination is a fact that exists everywhere, and the main reason is ignorance. We should deal with others as they are supposed to deal with us," Khalid Al-Sharideh, graduate student in sociology and panelist at the dialogue, said.

The student and faculty dialogue, which was co-sponsored by Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week and the KSU Committee on Religion, represented perspectives from the Christian, Hindu, Jewish and Muslim faiths.

All religious groups face discrimination, racism, homophobia and sexism within popular culture, Don Fallon, coordinator for K-State religious activities, said. The groups also face religious issues within themselves, he said.

"The purpose of the dialogue is to create a climate of understanding that would lead to a greater harmony, inclusiveness and sensitivity amongst religious groups," Fallon said.

Panel members were given 10 minutes to comment about their religion and discuss their concerns regarding people's understanding of different religions.

Hamed Ghazali, vice president of the Islamic Society of North America, said the media has a lot to do with people's misconception of different religious groups.

"Islam is almost the most controversial religion in the United States. People always get the negative and controversial picture from the media. I think it's very important to consider the purity of religion," Ghazali said.

Extremism concerning religions is also a problem, he said.

"Extremism is going to be there. We need to acknowledge it and give people a chance to explain themselves," Ghazali said. "If we can open our hearts to their beliefs, and share with them other opinions we can come one step closer to the other line."

People need to recognize religious symbols and activities, such as Christmas trees, which exclude people of different faiths, Debbie Perlman, senior in business management and representative of the Jewish faith, said.

And, she said, such symbols should not be on public property unless each faith can be represented.

Christian representative Thirkelle Howard said groups should be sensitive to others.

"We want to preach that we want to love everyone regardless of sex, age, race, religion or handicap. Everyone should be considerate of our sisters and brothers, regardless. We all are special," said Howard, coordinator of the academic achievement program for students of color.

The Oklahoma City bombing prompted students of the KSU Committee on Religion to become aware and concerned about the amount of violence and misconception against religious groups, Fallon said.

"This is an opportunity for faculty and students who represent their religious group to share their feelings and experiences," Fallon said.

Monica Schaeffer, freshman in nutritional science, said the key to getting along is understanding other's differences and respecting others.

"The problem today is ignorance," Schaeffer said. "We need to respect other's differences in opinions and beliefs."

lawyers and convened court with only a few reporters present. It was one of the fastest verdict decisions in memory for such a long, high-profile trial, indicating that once the sequestered jury broke its silence about the case, the panelists found they were all in agreement.

If they had any doubts, they were apparently answered by the re-reading of testimony from limousine driver Allan Park, who gave a precise, minute-by-minute account of his efforts to rouse Simpson for a trip to the airport the night of the murders.

Stern-faced and dressed casually, the jurors spent about 75 minutes listening to court reporter Janet Moxham read Park's testimony about his arrival at Simpson's estate. When the judge gave Moxham a 10-minute break, the jury forewoman quickly sent a note that said they had heard enough.

All they heard was testimony that prosecutors suggested jurors review — Park's descriptions of phone calls he made to his boss and mother and his efforts to summon a response from Simpson by ringing a bell at the gate to his Rockingham Avenue estate.

Three jurors took copious notes, particularly during the testimony about Park's 10:52 p.m. call from his boss — a crucial time in the prosecution's reconstruction of what happened the night of June 12, 1994.

Those jurors also took notes during Park's descriptions of the lighting at the estate.

Simpson trial victimizes participants, public

The most victimized aspect is the very basis of the trial. The focus has wrongly shifted from a man being a suspect in a double murder to a black man being the victim of a racial conspiracy.

The impressive charts and graphs have been dismantled. The camera cords have been rolled up. Exhausted jurors will be allowed to return to their homes, if they can remember where they live. The entire country waits breathlessly for the verdict of the trial of the century.

As the O.J. Simpson trial grinds to a merciful close, possibly the only issue pertaining to this trial that hasn't been addressed yet is exactly how many victims there really are.

Obviously, the brutal double murder of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman deserves the most attention and contemplation. Yet, so many other less conspicuous victims have been brutalized during this trial.

The American public has been assaulted with a barrage of media coverage that is nearly impossible to escape. Those people who don't regard the trial as a ludicrous example of the media's fascination with celebrity and the macabre are watching Court TV with glassy eyes and drool stains on their shirts.

Witnesses in the trial have been subjected to the worst kind of public scrutiny. A Los Angeles police detective has been forced to end his career and an FBI agent was unjustly compared to a racist.

The most victimized aspect is the very basis of the trial. The focus has wrongly shifted from a man being a suspect in a double murder to a black man being the victim of a racial conspiracy.

This has prolonged the trial and clouded the search for the truth in this case.

Although the trial is over, all of the perpetrators will never be brought to justice.

Unabomber's manifesto offers credible arguments

It used to be terrorism was something that only happened somewhere else. In the past few years, however, this innocence has been stripped away by a series of bombings perpetuated in the land of the free.

The first wake-up call came a few years ago with the bombing of the World Trade Center. Then came the horrendous disaster of the Oklahoma City bombing.

Now it's the Unabomber, responsible for three deaths and 23 injuries over the course of the last 17 years.

For those of you not familiar with the Unabomber, here's what is known. Sixteen bombs have been sent in the mail to a wide range of locations, all claiming to be from a group called FC. The places targeted range from universities to computer stores, from geneticists to newspapers.

The FBI has dubbed the culprit the Unabomber and contrary to the subject's claim that it is a group, believes it is a single white male in his early 40s. Although the FBI has released little of the information on which it bases this claim, it seems to have pieced together a good picture of what the Unabomber looks like.

COLUMN

LACH FRANQUEMONT

Interest in this case has increased quite substantially lately with the publishing of the Unabomber's manifesto in the Washington Post and the New York Times. In this 35,000 word document, the Unabomber lays out his case against modern society.

The Unabomber said all of the problems of our modern world can be linked to technology.

"The Industrial Revolution and its consequences have been a disaster for the human race," he said.

He then goes on to advocate a revolution against the industrialized system which, contrary to his actions, he claims could be gradual and non-violent.

After this preamble, six pages are dedicated to attacking what the Unabomber calls the leftists.

"The leftist is antagonistic to the concept of competition because, deep inside, he feels like a loser," he said.

Several more pages are devoted to defining concepts used in the rest of the manifesto before the Unabomber kicks into high gear.

The rest of the paper is devoted to laying out his arguments against society and offering possible solutions.

No matter how reprehensible the Unabomber's actions may be, his manifesto is very well laid out. His arguments are tight with many qualifications and footnotes that turn otherwise poor arguments into fairly convincing scenarios.

On the other hand, the Unabomber said nothing truly new. This kind of thinking has been around for literally ages and, although the Unabomber uses the arguments of many prominent Luddite thinkers (those who warn against too much technology), he fails to give credit to any of them.

As for myself, I view the Unabomber in a very different light than what has been portrayed by the press.

First off, despite FBI claims, I believe this is a group. The Manifesto has the feel of a paper written in conjunction with others. Although there is only one style of writing, all of the qualifications and footnotes point to peer criticism.

Secondly, I believe the Unabomber is much more educated than the high-school and partial-college education the FBI gives him credit for. In fact, if not involved in academia, this person was at least a doctoral candidate.

Third, despite all the attacks on leftism, this person is probably a former leftist. The manifesto goes to great pains to attack leftists and the way they think but pointedly steers clear of attacking leftist positions on issues.

Coming from the perspective of a devoted leftist, I also have to admit that many of the criticisms of leftism contain at least a kernel of truth. These are not the rantings of a Rush Limbaugh, but the self-introspections of an insider.

Many of the main points themselves could also be seen as leftist gone to libertarian. At times, it seems to wholeheartedly embrace communal systems. Then it moves over to a survival of the fittest mentality.

No matter what the Unabomber's affiliation, he has done it a disservice. Technology, while having many negative effects on the planet and its people, has numerous positive effects as well.

If people believe the only choice is between primitive existence and totalitarian control over our lives, most will pick totalitarian control.

"As for myself, I view the Unabomber in a very different light than what has been portrayed by the press."
LACH FRANQUEMONT

People must begin to see beyond these assumptions. It is a myth that large corporations are the only ones who can advance technology. There is no reason why we must give up our autonomy to live in our modern world.

Despite all of the problems I see with the Unabomber's manifesto, I believe it is well worth peoples' time to read. Well thought-out criticisms, even when we disagree with them, are becoming increasingly rare.

▶ WILDCAT WALK GRATEFUL

Editor,

We would like to express our sincere appreciation to all those who made the Wildcat Walk Escort Service the success it is.

Telecommunications, the campus police and KSU Housing and Dining have all contributed greatly to our efforts.

We would also like to thank the Collegian for the articles written promoting the escort service and encouraging students to use it at every opportunity.

We hope this will continue throughout the year.

We would also like to thank all of our escorts who volunteered already this year. Without their commitment, the service would not be possible.

Along with these thanks, we would like to clear up a few misconceptions about the service.

Our budget is about $700 from the KSU Association of Residence Halls. We have not received any money from Student Senate so far this year.

Also, the money allocated for an off-campus escort service ($20,000) is for the 1996-97 fiscal year and is for a completely separate program.

This new program for the next year would also involve security duties on campus and would be run by the K-State Police.

Our service uses only volunteers. They do not get paid.

We would also like to update the campus on the service. We have about 100 escorts with about 60 men and 40 women.

Due to the great number of escort requests we have received, we still need more volunteers. Applications are available at any residence hall front desk or one can be obtained by contacting Lin Bliss or Jason Oblander.

We have enough volunteers to provide escorts for anyone who needs one, but the more volunteers we have, the fewer nights per month they are on duty.

Once again, thanks to all those connected with the escort service, and most importantly, keep those calls coming!

Raising academic standards
bolsters K-State's reputation

There's been a lot of talk lately about the funding crisis our school may soon be facing.

Our administration officials are worried that cuts in funding, when we are already under-funded, will impair K-State's ability to teach all the extra new students who everybody says are coming in the next few years.

What to do? Without money, K-State can't pay enough faculty. Without enough faculty, K-State can't provide a good education. Without providing a good education, both the students and the school's reputation will suffer.

President Jon Wefald and others have a couple solutions to offer. Let's take a look.

Reward teaching: Apparently, some of our professors don't really like doing all that pesky research that brings reputation, and in some cases money, to our school.

So, the administration says, let them teach. Don't punish those teachers who wish to spend more time educating their students than mucking about with research.

The best thing is that this will allow those teachers who really want to do only research to focus more on their own projects.

How does this result in more teaching getting done? Don't ask me. Trust the administration. They have charts and graphs.

Access new technology: If we stay on the cutting edge of technology, we won't need as many professors. Student contact hours will be replaced by the latest in teaching technology.

Does this mean more of our classes will be taught in the manner of Principles of Biology? It'll be fun to learn College Algebra from tapes every week, and have weekly, multiple choice Expository Writing tests in a computer-graded, multiple-choice format.

For too many students, according to some faculty members, reading a book is accessing new technology.

Neither of these ideas are very attractive. With the funding situation, it is unrealistic to expect that K-State can continue existing as the same kind of entity.

K-State does, however, have another option. It can raise its academic standards.

We shouldn't do away with the open-admissions policy. It is a good thing, and it rewards the taxpayers somewhat for their help in funding.

Instead, let's make our intro-level classes harder. Right now, students can continue to fumble through school for semesters and semesters, gathering more and more debt, before they have to leave.

Flunking students out is an unpleasant policy to enforce and one that would have knocked me right out of K-State my freshman year. But it is the best idea going.

Students who don't have the adequate preparation, who don't have adequate time, or who (as was my case) are unwilling to do the work to achieve a true higher education don't need to be in remedial classes here.

It's hard for me to get real excited about a lot of campus issues that crop up from year to year, because by the time they have any effect on K-State, I (and all of my friends) will have graduated and moved on.

It's true that this is a long-term issue as well. The quality of teaching isn't likely to suffer in the short term, and certainly not before I graduate in May.

But even those of you who, like me, are almost done with this school, should be concerned about this.

For example, say in five years, for whatever reason, you find yourself looking for a job. Your credentials consist mainly of work experience, and your K-State degree.

How much is your K-State degree going to be worth if younger K-State grads aren't able to write well, or don't know Algebra? Their reputation will become your reputation.

B.C. CAMP II

Students, do you think you're ethnically conscious? Are you sure that you never act with racism against other people? Racism isn't always as outwardly prevelant at K-State as it is at other institutions of higher learning. However, that doesn't mean racism doesn't exist at this primarily white institution.

commentary by B.C. Camp II

Every morning there are students who hear the ever-persistent wail of the alarm clock, which signals the start of another day on the yard. And every morning, they have to ask themselves, "Is it worth it?"

They think of their mother, father, grandfather, or whoever gave them the "I'm so proud of you" speech. They think of Bobby Joe Jenkins, from down the street in their old neighborhood, who's doing all right for himself without having spent a minute in a college classroom.

After two snooze buttons worth of debate, half of these students get up to try to finish their time on this predominantly white institution.

Please excuse the political incorrectness, but if you are going to refer to one race by a color, you should do so with all of them.

For the past 12 years black (African Americans), brown (Hispanic and Mexican) and red (American Indian and Alaskan native) have had the lowest retention rates on campus.

During those 12 years, K-State has averaged about 2,610 first-time freshmen students each year, of which 2,430 of those students were white. Out of those 2,430 students, about 76 percent return for their second year. However only 53 percent of black, brown and red students return for their second year.

There are several possible reasons for this low return rate, but the most popular reason is that K-State isn't socially conducive to minority students.

There is no easy way to explain this, and it requires you to be totally honest with yourself. How many students have ever walked into a room where everyone in the room was much older than you, or all dressed alike, or they are all members of a club and are discussing things you can't comment on?

Better yet — this is where the total honesty comes in — how many white students have ever walked into a room full of black, brown or red students and felt a bit uncomfortable?

"I can't count the number of times I've been the only black in a class and when an issue concerning minorities comes up, the atmosphere totally changes," Shontell Carter, graduate student in journalism and mass communications, said.

"It's as if they are posing the question or conversation solely at you. A teacher might look at you for the first time in the semester or stagger when discussing racism or related topics. This only draws more attention to the fact that you're different."

You feel like you don't belong and everyone is staring at you, waiting for you to say or do something. You try to shrug it off, because you know you shouldn't feel that way, but everywhere you go and anything you say is a constant reminder you don't fit in.

You either find a corner where one or two other outcasts have congregated or you just give up and go home. For the most part, no one in the room did anything to make you leave. In fact, most of them were quite cordial. They said hi, conversed with you and invited you to come and be a part of the discussions, but you couldn't relate. This made you feel even more uncomfortable.

"Trying to relate has a tremendous affect on us," said Gemini Pankey, Black Student Union vice president.

"Those of us who are not used to the large white-to-minority ratio experience culture shock. Some of us don't adjust and go home. K-State doesn't have enough minority faculty members so there's no one to reach out to, or to show you the ropes."

This is the frustration students of color deal with every day on this campus. For some, it's a lot easier because they've had to deal with it most of their lives, but for others, it can be unbearable.

"No one is trying to make you feel uncomfortable. You just don't feel a part of the community," said Omar Davis, president of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc. "There isn't a lot of racial tension on this campus. It's just that all the events are geared towards white students," he said.

Without trying to be too stereotypical, how many white students out there know what a stepshow is; have ever been to a spades or domino party; or know who D'Angelo is? Most events sponsored by the residence halls or the K-State Student Union don't involve students of color during the planning. Therefore the music and theme is more apt to attract white students.

It's only human to want to do things that interest you and people like you. What many organizations on campus forget about are the one or two outcasts sitting in the corner.

It's not only the extracurricular activities that are causing a problem, but also classroom time as well.

"I can't count the number of times I've been the only black in a class and when an issue concerning minorities comes up, the atmosphere totally changes," said Shontell Carter, graduate student in journalism and mass communications.

"It's as if they are posing the question or conversation solely at you. A teacher might look at you for the first time in the semester or stagger when discussing racism or related topics. This only draws more attention to the fact that you're different," she said.

Many minority students feel like they are made the representative for their race when a question concerning race comes up.

Students or teachers might inadvertently direct comments or questions dealing with controversial race issue towards them, as if to get their approval on what was said. These incidents are all constant reminders of where you're at and that you are in a constant battle with ignorance.

"There are people who beat around the bush because they think you're going to attack them if they say something offensive," said Jeanette Torres, member of Sigma Lambda Gamma.

"They look straight at you and ask a question that would require a census of all minority students to answer. I have to tell them that this is only my opinion and that I'm not speaking for my race," Torres said.

Since 1984, the numbers of black, brown and red first-time freshmen have almost doubled, but unfortunately the retention rate hasn't moved.

"Students are coming in and having a hard time making the adjustment from high school to college. They haven't been forewarned about ignoring the distracters and maintaining their grades," William Coleman, minority coordinator for recruitment, said.

"We are trying to encourage freshmen to get involved. When you're involved you tend to have a harder time making the decision to leave," he said.

"We are also working with the minority greek organizations to provide more social outlets for students of color. It's going to take time. The enrollment has gone up and with the cooperation of the campus community, so will the retention rate," Coleman said.

Since black, brown and red students only account for 5.8 percent of first-time freshmen, it's easy to say "who cares." It's easy to turn your back to the minority when you're in the majority.

At some point in your life you'll either be in the minority or you'll be forced to communicate and work with minorities. If you've never taken the time to learn anything about them, then you'll never be able to communicate in the work environment or on a social level.

All students are responsible for their own success or failure, but none of us can afford to stand and watch as segregation becomes an everyday part of our lives. So when that alarm clock goes off, and you think about hitting that snooze button ten more times, think about what happens when you quit or turn your back on "other" people's problems.

Whether you're black, white, red, brown or yellow you are slowly destroying what sets this country apart from all the rest. It's time to wake up.

Emmitt Smith best back in the game

COLUMN

SHANE McCORMICK

I happened to pick up an issue of the University Daily Kansan last week to look at the sports section.

I usually like to just glance at its sports section, because I know there is nothing substantial to read about Jayhawk sports.

But something got my attention on the front page. It was a column. The title read "Emmitt Ain't No Barry." So, I decided to read the column. As I read, I got more upset.

The point the columnist, Matt Irwin, was making was that Emmitt Smith was not even close to being as good of a running back as Barry Sanders.

There are three points Mr. Irwin made in his comparison of the two backs.

The first point he made is that the Detroit Lions have a weak offensive line, and the Cowboys have the best offensive line in football. He wrote that if Smith and Sanders were to switch teams, Sanders would be the successful back, while Smith would struggle.

Well Matt, I have to disagree with you there.

If the Lions offensive line is so bad, how is it that Sanders is able to have so many 100-yard games or so many 1,000-yard rushing seasons? I'll admit, Sanders has tremendous ability as a runner, but there's only so far you can go on ability. You have to have some help from your offensive line.

The fact is, Barry Sanders is the reason why Barry Sanders gets shut down at times. When Sanders gets the hand-off and gets to the line of scrimmage, he surveys his different options, looking to make the fancy move. This is why he is thrown for so many losses in the backfield. Many times his offensive line has made holes for him, he just hasn't hit them yet.

Smith, on the other hand, hits his holes immediately. By the time Sanders is trying to make his juke move at the line of scrimmage, Smith would be already 10 yards down the field.

The second point Mr. Irwin made is that Smith wouldn't be as effective if he didn't have the best quarterbacks and wide receivers in the NFL taking pressure off the running game.

Well Matt, I agree with you on part of that statement.

Yes, quarterback Troy Aikman and wide receiver Michael Irvin are two of the best at their respective positions in the NFL. But to imply that Sanders would be so much better if he was put in that situation is stretching it.

The last time I looked, the Lions had a pretty good quarterback, Scott Mitchell, and a great wide receiver, Herman Moore. Last Monday night against the San Francisco 49ers, Mitchell passed for nearly 300 yards. Moore caught six passes for 73 yards, and wide-out Brett Perriman caught nine passes for 115 yards. I'd say the Lions provided enough passing to take pressure off Sanders.

The third point made by Mr. Irwin is Smith isn't even the second-best back in football. Indianapolis Colt running back Marshall Faulk is the second-best back in football.

Uh, Matt, have you been blinded by all of that ugly blue, red and yellow you're forced to look at in Lawrence?

My little 4-year-old niece could recognize that Smith is a better back than Faulk. Hey, maybe she can get hired on the sports staff of the UDK.

Although Faulk is a good back (and I would like to see him do well this year for my fantasy football team), there's absolutely no comparison to the greatness of Emmitt Smith.

I'm the first to admit that Sanders is a great back in the NFL. He's just not as good as Smith.

Smith not only hits holes quickly, once he gets into the secondary, he's the most dangerous back in the NFL. He can run over and drag so many defenders in the secondary, it's not even funny. I have yet to see Sanders run over any defenders.

And if you don't think Smith can pull off the spin moves like Sanders, just check out the Reebok preseason commercial with Smith in it. In the commercial, Smith is shown putting a spin move on two defenders, causing them to collide.

Interesting statistics:

Emmitt Smith — No. 1 rusher in the NFL this year with 543 yards and nine touchdowns through just four games.

Barry Sanders — No. 6 rusher in the NFL this year with 314 yards and just one touchdown through four games.

Marshall Faulk (the second-best running back according to Irwin) — Let's just say there's 18 other running backs that were ahead of him after week four.

Administration thumps SGA

The Anderson Hall Annihilators lived up to their name Tuesday, as President Jon "Dr. K" Wefald pitched a shutout against the Student Governing Association.

Support behind Wefald was strong as the SGA bats were held to only two hits.

On offense, the Annihilators shelled the SGA pitching staff, driving in 21 runs in five innings.

"The pitching was the difference in the game," K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said.

"Pitching is always critical in any kind of softball or baseball event, and I hope our guys will be able to pitch as well this spring as Dr. Wefald did in this game. A two-hitter in softball — that's amazing."

SGA athletic liaison and Collegian sports editor Dan Lewerenz was voted Most Valuable Player for SGA by the Annihilators, despite impressive defensive plays by shortstop Bryan Vaughn, technology senator.

"Thank goodness we had a player from the student newspaper because without him we might have lost," John Fairman, assistant vice president for University relations and Annihilators' manager, said. "Without him at second base I think we could have lost."

Vaughn, who commuted from Salina to participate, gave SGA some hope for a comeback in the third inning when he forced K-State Physical Plant Supervisor Jacki Toburen out at second for the third out, halting the Annihilators' offense. Not receiving any support from second baseman Gip Githens, education senator, Vaughn was forced to dive into the bag to make the play.

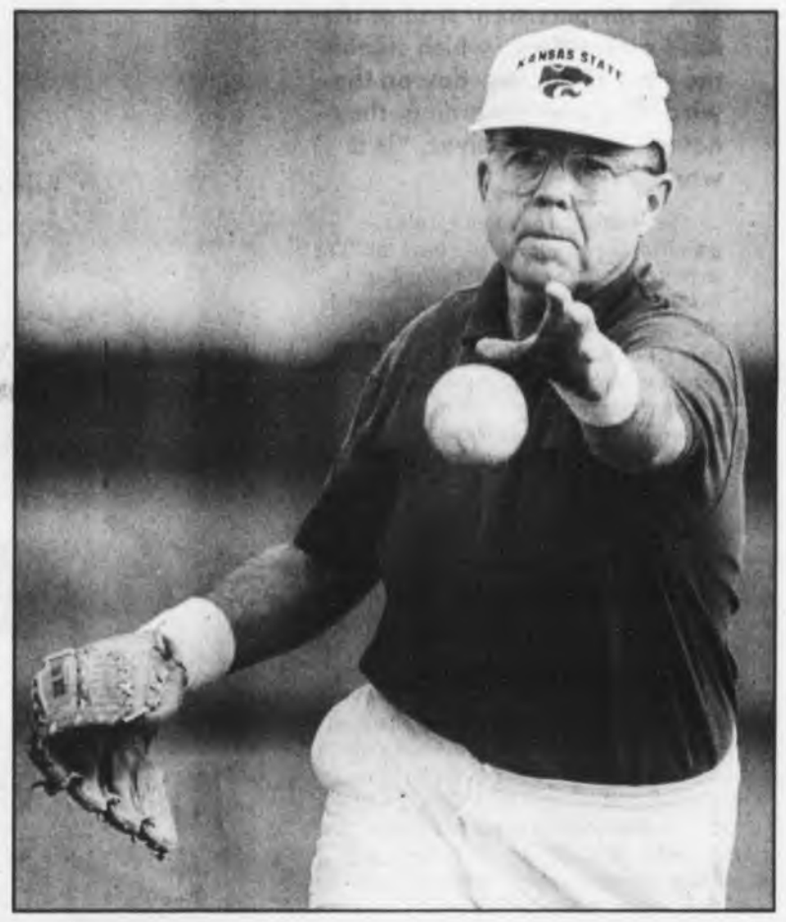
"It was a real turning point in the game," Vaughn said. "You could look over at their bench and see the fear in their eyes."

Githens took himself out of the lineup after that play, and said that it was probably better for the team.

"Vaughn is just making all my plays, I'm just standing there lollygagging," Githens said. "I just felt like to help the team out I'd take myself out of the lineup and just be a designated hitter, focus on hitting. That's our weak point, well, one of our weak points."

SGA manager Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, said she believed that John Struve, home-plate umpire and state employee, might have been paid off by the administration.

"They need to know their slo-pitch softball rules. There's no stealing, so that means if the pitcher pitches the ball and they're off base, they're out," Halinski said.



After watching his third strike whistle by, senate chair John Potter agreed with Halinski.

"That umpire smelled as bad as last year's budget," he said.

This was the seventh meeting of the two teams, and the Annihilators own the series 6-1.

K-State assistant basketball coach Mark Fox summed up the game in five words.

"That was a Wefald masterpiece."

Soccer team strives for trip to nationals, varsity status

Todd Stweart
assistant sports editor

Although the K-State Soccer Club has never made it to nationals, there are hopes that this year might be the year.

Junior goalie Andrew Francis said the team controls its own destiny.

"We definitely have what it takes to get to nationals," Francis said. "If we can keep our heads on straight.

"That is our main goal."

Soccer Club President Eric Fitzwater said the club is taking steps in the right direction.

"We're playing like a team and really coming together," he said.

The team's record currently stands at 7-3, and Fitzwater said he points to the team's first tournament of the season as a big turning point for the club.

"We were playing like total ass," Fitzwater said.

"And since then, we've consistently been playing well."

The club sits at first in the south region of its conference of 12 teams from six different states.

Fitzwater said the improvement could be attributed to a better scoring offense.

"In the past we didn't have a lot of offense, with maybe only five or six guys that could put it in the net," he said.

"Now we have a more consistent quality. Every position is being filled by a person of college-caliber soccer."

Francis said the younger members of the team also deserve credit.

"The youth are really starting to step up to the challenge," he said.

Senior stopper Brent Carpani said he agreed.

"With some of our good, new guys and old guys, we've become a strong all-around team," he said.

The team's next match is against Wichita State at 10 a.m. Saturday in Frank Anneberg Park.

But for the long-term, the club's continuing goal is the move to varsity stature.

Fitzwater said funding is one of the primary advantages of being a varsity sport. He said the club only gets $917 per semester from K-State.

"Right now, a lot of it comes out of our own pockets," he said. "Which means we've had to cut the number of tournaments and games we can enter."

Carpani said the lack of funding hits each player.

"It comes out of our pockets each semester," he said.

Francis said the team could use the money not only for game and tournament expenses, but also to bring out some more players.

"All the talent never comes out for soccer," Francis said. "If they were even offered a little scholarship, the team would become more popular, and you could get some of the better players, who aren't playing now, to come out."

Another area to work on, Fitzwater said, is getting the club's name out to the public.

"We need to get more involved and get our name out," he said. "We really need public support."

Carpani said it is important for the team's move to varsity to come soon.

"We're going to fall behind if we don't go varsity in the next couple of years," he said.

▶ WRESTLING

Intramural tournament a success

■ Sigma Chi, Marlatt 3, Hosses win division titles

Chris May
staff reporter

K-State students gathered Thursday and Friday to find out who was the best wrestler on campus.

The intramural wrestling tournament began Monday and ended Friday with all-University championships in 10 weight classes. The wrestlers competed in weight classes of 126, 134, 142, 150, 158, 166, 175, 185, 196 and heavyweight. Each day wrestlers were eliminated until the championships Thursday and Friday.

Thursday's championship included separate divisions for fraternities, residence halls and independents.

The winners of the fraternity division included 126 — Jason Strohm, Sigma Chi; 134 — Brian Thompson, Delta Tau Delta; 142 — Jason Pottorf, Phi Kappa Theta; 150 — Tray Shell, Pi Kappa Alpha; 158 —Ryan Howard, Sigma Phi Epsilon; 166 — Casey O'Connor, Sigma Alpha Epsilon; 175 — Derek Peine, Phi Kappa Tau; 185 — Jed Fitzpatrick, Phi Kappa Alpha; 195 — Jeff Struve, Theta Xi; and heavyweight Jason Holder, Tau Kappa Epsilon.

Sigs won the overall wrestling division for fraternities with 89 points. The Pike house took second place with 66 points and SAE was third with 58 points.

In the residence halls division the winners included 126 — Shannon Cummins, Marlatt 3; 134 — Anthony Oropeza, Haymaker 6; 142 — Alan Mattox, Moore 1; 150 — Jason Bell, Moore 2; 166 — Todd Munson, Moore 7; 175 — Nay Petnoy, Haymaker 3; 185 — Myron Chase, Moore 7; 196 — Keith O'Halloran, Goodnow 1.

Marlatt 3 came in first with 29 points, Moore 7 was second with 26 points and Moore 1, Haymaker 3, and Haymaker 6 tied for third with 13 points.

The independent category wresting champions included 126 — Chad Carriaga; 134 — Scott Burke; 142 — Brian Budke; 150 — Trevor Eder; 158 — Shawn Fox; 166 — Mark Ford; 175 — Mitch Beims; 185 — Travis Renner; 196 — Jesse Prater and heavyweight Tim Appelhans.

The Hosses took first in the overall independent group with 85 points, second place was Smith House with 33 and in third place was the Raptors with 31 points.

Friday's wrestling match was the all-University championship. In the 126 weight class, Carriaga beat Cummings; in 134, Oropeza beat Burke, but lost to Thompson; in 142, Budke defeated Mattox; in 150, Shell beat Eder; in 158, Fox won the title with a bye; in 166, Munson defeated Ford; in 175, Beims defeated Peine and Petnoy; in 185, Fitzpatrick beat Renner, then lost to Chase; in 196, Prater beat O'Halloran, then lost to Jeff Struve; and in heavyweight, Holder won the title after Appelhans was forced to leave early due to an injury.

Beims, senior in secondary education, said the wrestling tournament seemed to be an overall success.

"I thought there was some pretty good competition this year, a lot better than last year when I wrestled," Beims said.

"I had some pretty good matches here in the finals."

KSU THEATRE PRESENTS "TWELFTH NIGHT"

"Twelfth Night," a wacky Shakespeare comedy, will be at 8 p.m. Oct. 5-6 and 12-14 in Nichols Theatre.

False identities, romantic twists and a bunch of lively characters are mingled with love, lyrical beauty and rowdy laughter to fashion a play that will leave you rolling in the aisle.

Tickets are available at McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428 from noon to 5 p.m. weekdays. Prices are $8 for the general public and $6 for students and senior citizens.

HARMONY WEEK POETRY

Kevin Young, African American poet and National Poetry Series winner, will give a poetry reading at 4 p.m. Thursday in Union 212.

Young's most recent publication, "Most Way Home," won him the National Poetry Series Award. Young's focus on African American culture and African American writers has provided a wide array of writing experience for him and his readers. Young has given more than 20 readings in the past four years.

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

Get rich quick!

It's absolutely true. K-State has provided a great get-rich-quick scheme that is so good it deserves its own infomercial.

It's all quite simple but rather painful. The scheme only really requires you and a total stranger to make it happen.

Right now, K-State has enough people riding their bikes on the sidewalks to create a Tour de K-State.

Many times, pedestrians like you and I are rudely forced off the sidewalk to accommodate careless bikers.

There are financial opportunities waiting to happen in these dozens of daily occurrences.

Most pedestrians get out of the way of the bicyclers to avoid a painful collision. After all, the instinctive pleasure principle warrants that we humans avoid pain and maximize pleasure.

Yet we humans are more than mere creatures of instinct, aren't we? There's money to be made from such collisions, after all.

Let me spell it out for you: Get yourself run over by a person riding a bike on a sidewalk and sue, sue, sue.

Sue the biker. Sue the University. Sue the company that designed the sidewalk. Sue the construction company and the employee who poured the concrete. Sue everybody except the Collegian and me. Cash in! It's the American way! Everyone is doing it, why not you?

In May 1992, someone was riding a bike on campus sidewalks, ran over a garden hose, had a wreck and sued the University for not preventing her from riding her bike on the sidewalks. She won $23,000 from K-State. She got all that money for a measly arm injury!

Imagine how much more money you'd make for a neck injury, by suing the University as well as the person who ran over you.

Why, you could afford K-State Student Union food for about a year with the money you'd get! Or you could put yourself through graduate school! What a bargain!

So the next time some bozo uses the sidewalk like its a highway and treats you like potential roadkill, call the biker's bluff. Don't get out of the way. Let the biker smack into you. Fall over. Make a lot of noise. Have someone call the Collegian so we can send a photographer. (They love to shoot gory stuff like that.)

Then, while you're laid up at the hospital, watch some daytime television and, eventually, you'll get the names and numbers of several personal injury lawyers.

You'll really make their day when you call, if they don't call you first. Tell them my plan and that I, as your legal adviser, am to be paid five percent of any benefits you receive.

Also, keep in mind this plan can backfire.

If the bike rider were to hit the dirt instead of run over you, things could get ugly for you. The bike rider would undoubtedly sue the University and anyone else possible, including you, for not getting out of the way like a good pedestrian.

So, like so many other entrepreneurial opportunities, there is risk involved and past results are no guarantee of future performance, etc. You've heard it all, right? The fine print doesn't matter.

Just remember "crash" rhymes with "cash."

2 K-State grads win fellowship

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Two K-State graduates were awarded the chance to study architecture on an international scale.

The Skidmore, Owings & Merrill Foundation Fellowships were given to graduates Kevin Le and Mark McGlothlin, who were selected from a pool of 290 students in North America.

"I think for anyone who grows up in the Midwest, particularly, seeing the full scale of, say, architecture in Europe is just incredibly important," Jim Jones, associate professor of architecture, said. "It's important to realize the place it has in life and the arts."

McGlothlin, who chose not to study abroad earlier because of his dual degree program, said he is considering designations in Italy.

Observing or studying with Santiago Calatrava, a Spanish architect residing in Zurich, is also one of McGlothlin's interests.

"There is no real designation to what you have to study. This is not designed to be classroom study but personal investigation," McGlothlin said.

Le, the 1994-95 Ranft Scholar of the American Institute of Architects of the St. Louis chapter, studied under Jones.

Jones said Le will become a significant and chief designer in his field.

"This type of student is a delight to have in class. They are highly motivated, energetic and when pointed in a direction, always exceed your expectations," he said.

Both Le and McGlothlin will receive 90 percent of their award upon approval of their travel itinerary and study program.

The final amount will be awarded upon completion of final reports illustrated by sketches or photographs and documentations of personal viewpoints and analysis of the study and travel.

Nothing replaces the type of independent, firsthand experience each will receive, Jones said.

"It's impressive. Out of as many as 14,000 possible students to be nominated, Le and one of his classmates won these fellowships," Jones said.

McGlothlin, who is completing the last of the sixth and half year dual degree program in architecture and architectural engineering, and Le were selected to interview in London during the final round.

"First we were selected and nominated by the faculty, and then we submitted a portfolio," McGlothlin said. "I didn't think I'd get into the finals. It was more of a surprise than anything."

Afghan sales to benefit Farrell Library

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

A tight-knit afghan, which depicts sites of K-State and Manhattan, is earning Farrell Library $4 with each sale.

The Country Gift Shop created and designed the afghan and plans to donate $4 of each $49.95 sale and an initial $900 donation to library expansion.

"Every little bit helps," Brice Hobrock, dean of university libraries, said. "It all adds up, and we're very appreciative of it."

The gift shop also plans to donate an afghan to the University.

"We wanted to do something for the community, and we knew the school was adding on to the library, so we decided to donate the money to them," Claudette Laurie, Country Gift Shop owner, said.

The project took about eight months to create, but it was worth the time and effort, Laurie said.

"We've sold a lot more than first anticipated," Laurie said. "We've only had them for a week and have already sold about 50."

Riley County Courthouse, Manhattan Town Center, American Institute of Baking, Sunset Zoological Park, Fort Riley, Manhattan Christian College, Riley County Historical Museum, Anderson Hall, Wagner Stadium, Bramlage Coliseum and Tuttle Creek Reservoir are shown on the afghan.

"We are genuinely proud of our hometown, and we wanted to provide this unique afghan to local citizens and those interested in the area of Manhattan," Laurie said.

A similar design was seen in national gift markets, and Laurie said she wanted to do something like them.

After developing the blanket, Laurie sent pictures of Manhattan and a rough layout of the afghan design to a looming company in North Carolina.

Several businesses, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and many local citizens were very supportive and encouraged the idea, Laurie said.

"I think it's a marvelous idea. I'm very grateful for Claudette thinking of such a wonderful gift that not only highlights Manhattan and K-State, but also benefits the library," Ruth Ann Wefald, K-State and community volunteer, said.

"The library is the heart and soul of the University, and I'm very excited and grateful for the whole idea, and I hope everybody supports it," she said.

Fort Riley downsizing affects teachers, students

Gina Buster
staff reporter

Downsizing at Fort Riley has already begun to affect Junction City and the surrounding area.

The base is the largest single employer in Kansas with a payroll of $511 million.

Fort Riley also accounts for 17 percent, or $51.8 million, of total retail sales in Riley County and 25.3 percent, or $27.3 million, in Geary County, according to figures from Kansans for a Strong Fort Riley.

Mary Devin, superintendent of USD 475 Geary County schools, said downsizing has affected the school district's enrollment and budget.

"Our numbers are still preliminary, but we are fairly certain enrollment has decreased by more than 500 students," Devin said.

Because of such a large decrease in enrollment, economic changes had to be made within the school system.

Many of the teaching positions that were made vacant last spring remained so in order to cut the district's budget. So far no faculty or staff members have been laid off because of budget cuts, Devin said.

In response to budget cuts, schools had to put children together in different configurations using multi-age grouping.

"An example of multi-age grouping is putting third and fourth graders together in the same class," Devin said.

This year, the Geary County school district will lose $400,000 in funds.

"Next year we'll see the real impact of decline in enrollment. If enrollment stays the same as this year, we will have to reduce the budget by another $1.5 million. That means we will have to reduce the staff further because 85 percent of our budget is for staff," Devin said.

Along with staff reductions, student programs will also have to be abandoned, but the hope is for enrollment to increase next year, he said.

"I hope by spring we will have a better sense of what things look like at Fort Riley. This year will require a lot of teachers and support services because of the high turnover rate among students. This year we must be prepared year-round to do things most of the districts will only have to do in the beginning," Devin said.

Not only have the schools been hit hard financially but also psychologically. This time of transition brings about great uncertainty for families, and that creates a lot of stress, Devin said.

"We're really sensitive about this stressful time. No one is sure what will happen next, but we're all anxious about this year of change," Devin said.

Not only have schools suffered an economic blow, but businesses have as well.

David Nelson, president of the Junction City Chamber of Commerce, said many of the businesses already have seen a slight sag in sales from the same time last year.

Nelson said, however, that he isn't too worried.

"There will definitely be an impact we're going to feel, but I don't think it will have a crippling effect like people once thought," Nelson said.

When the news of downsizing was first released, Nelson said the biggest effect was felt psychologically.

"People were scared at first that there would be a jump in stores going out of business, but now they have a much more positive perspective. There will be a slight decrease in sales, but it won't put anyone out of business," Nelson said.

Mark Estey, owner of Fashion Masters Cleaners and Laundry, said he has already noticed a 30-percent decrease in business.

Military personnel make up about 80 percent of Estey's clientele, and the loss of troops to the area could be devastating.

"There are a lot of civilian jobs being lost because of downsizing, and I don't appreciate that. But I'd rather see downsizing than see it close completely," Estey said.

Estey estimates he will suffer losses of a minimum of $10,000 a month. To combat those losses, Estey will have to lay-off employees.

Fiji's sponsor annual 'Run for Leukemia'

Collegian staff

University of Kansas and K-State are not only battling each other. They are also fighting a battle against leukemia.

The Phi Gamma Deltas will sponsor the 22nd Annual Fiji Run for Leukemia this month.

"We will run the game-day football from Lawrence to Manhattan the day before the KU-K-State game on Oct. 28," said Aaron Mayes, Fiji philanthropy chairman and junior in finance and economics.

"Bill Snyder, Fiji alumnus, donates the game-day football for us to use for the run," said Trevor Williams, last year's Fiji philanthropy chairman and senior in advertising graphic design.

The run begins early Oct. 27 at the KU Fiji house and ends at the K-State football field before the game.

During the pregame, Gov. Bill Graves will be present to watch the Fijis donate a check to the Leukemia Foundation, Mayes said.

Fiji chapter members of KU and K-State will take turns running throughout the day.

"As long as someone is running the ball the whole way, it doesn't matter how many people there are to run," Mayes said. "We play leap frog by taking turns running and driving."

The run began in 1974 when K-State Fiji, Rod Morgan, died of leukemia, Mayes said.

"Ever since our fraternity brother passed away, we have been raising money for the cause," Mayes said.

The Fijis donate their money to the Leukemia Foundation based in Wichita. The Leukemia Foundation supports five major programs, which include research, patient aid, community service, public and professional

Cellular phone fraud affects students, results in higher fees

Collegian staff

You might think you are safe from fraud because you don't give your cellular phone number out to strangers.

But if you leave your phone on regularly, you might as well paint your number across a billboard.

If your phone is on, cellular phone bandits can literally pull your phone number out of the air, reprogram their phone with your number and charge their calls to your bill.

Customers so far have not had to pay fraudulent phone bills, but the cellular phone industry had to absorb more than $1 million per day in losses last year. Part of that cost is passed to the customer in higher service prices, said Kelley Weis, manager of roaming and fraud control at Kansas Cellular.

Cellular phone fraud is no longer just the concern of CEOs. Even college students should be concerned.

This fall, many college students took advantage of a Kansas Cellular program that allows free phone calls on weekends and after 9 p.m following payment of a service fee.

"We had quite a rush to purchase phones before school started," Weis said.

Zach Harris, freshman in political science, and Scott Squires, sophomore in finance, both said they purchased phones so they could call home for free.

But cellular phone fraud is far from their minds.

"I don't lose sleep over it," Squires said.

Harris said he does closely monitor his phone bills because he has heard about phone fraud on television.

"I mostly monitor my bills, though, to make sure my roommates aren't stealing my phone," he said with a laugh. "That's my biggest concern."

The phone fraud is no laughing matter for the cellular phone industry, which experienced a 100-percent growth rate in fraud last year. With more than 30,000 subscriptions issued a day by cellular phone companies, the rates are expected to climb even higher this year.

"So far this year, we've already experienced a 50-percent growth rate," Weis said.

The rates are increasing because many bandits are realizing how easy it is to steal the numbers, and most don't believe they are doing anything wrong, Weis said.

"It's like putting a cable filter on your TV to get extra channels for free," Weis said. "People do this without thinking it's stealing, but it really is stealing from the carrier."

Lauren Armentraut, fraud coordinator at Cellular One, said bandits generally use one of two methods to steal cellular phone numbers.

The most popular method is cloning. All cellular phones have an electronic serial number, which is an identification number much like the number inscribed on an automobile's dash.

Anytime a cellular phone is on, it sends signals and its ESN to a nearby cellular phone station. The bandits, using an ESN reader, can pick up those signals, download the ESN to a computer and reprogram their phone with the stolen ESN.

Because all cellular phone calls are verified and charged to the ESN, the bandits' phone calls will be charged to the stolen ESN.

The ESN reader is used by cellular carrier employees to test the phones, but the ESN reader is now being sold on the black market, Weis said.

"The distributor of the reader wasn't checking the background of the purchasers," she said. "The distributors just took them at their word that they were employees of a cellular phone company.

"At that time, virtually anyone who said they were an employee could get a reader. Now, they check to see if you are a legitimate cellular carrier."

Bandits can also buy lists of ESNs that have not yet been assigned by the cellular phone companies.

Kansas Cellular recently won a court case against a 40-year-old Minnesota housewife who had purchased the ESN list with her cellular phone at a pawn shop, Weis said.

The woman had made more than $1,000 in phone calls to her boyfriend and friends, she said.

Weis said the bandits can be anyone from drug dealers to business people to college students.

So far, no fraud has been reported in Kansas, but residents of Kansas who travel to major metropolitan areas, such as Los Angeles, New York, Chicago or Miami, have fallen victim to the fraud, Armentraut said.

Armentraut said Cellular One is a strictly rural cellular company, but they still have on average $1,000 in losses per day.

Because of the loss from fraud, Cellular One and Kansas Cellular are both monitoring their customers' phone calls more carefully. If they see an unusually high number of calls being charged to a customer's bill, they call the customer immediately to see if the calls were legitimate.

If the calls were due to fraud, the customer's ESN is immediately canceled, and the customer is given a new number.

Armentraut said the cellular phone companies are working closely together to locate the bandits, but cellular fraud can be difficult to trace because the bandit simply moves to a new ESN when the old number is canceled.

How to protect your cellular phone

The cellular phone industry experienced a 100-percent growth rate in fraud last year. The easiest defense against cellular phone fraud is for the customer to employ three cautious habits.

- Never leave the phone on when not in use.
- Always monitor your phone bill carefully.
- Report any fraudulent calls immediately.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

FEE

"The No.1 goal is to put it on a review cycle," Tomb said. "It's too premature to say what level the fee should be at."

Usually, Senate not only sets the fee level, but it also sets up the organization that oversees the fee. He said his committee's job also includes reviewing how the money is spent and students' involvement in making those decisions.

As a part of the review process, some members of student government have proposed making some student fees user fees. Under a user-fee system, only the students who attend the programs sponsored by the Union Program Council would have to pay to attend.

The user-fee system proposal is an attempt to reduce the cost of higher education.

With the $2 fee, UPC has been able to offer more events and activities for students at a very minimal or no cost.

The fee money makes up about 55 percent of UPC's programming budget. UPC has a budget of $130,000, with $70,000 from the student fee, $30,000 from the Union and $30,000 in administrative support funds, Carney said.

"With the student fee money, UPC has been able to greatly expand our programming," he said.

The fee money was used to bring in Live and Weezer, Big Head Todd and the Monsters, and the Soul Asylum and Matthew Sweet concerts. UPC made about $2,300 from the concerts last year.

"On Live and Weezer, we made roughly $4,000 to $4,500," Carney said.

The Dave Matthews Band and Big Head Todd and the Monsters cost UPC about $2,200, he said. Ticket sales for this fall's concert have been going slowly, but Carney said he expects them to pick up.

UPC did not do as well on the Soul Asylum concert Monday night. As of noon Monday, only 905 tickets had been sold for the concert. UPC needed to sell 3,650 tickets to break even on the concert, Carney said. He said the concert cost UPC about $40,000 and will probably rule out a spring concert.

"UPC will have to rethink bringing major concerts to the K-State campus," he said.

UPC would not be able to afford to have concerts like Soul Asylum under a user-fee system. UPC must be able to guarantee a certain number of sold seats in order to book a band, and it must also guarantee a fee for booking the bands.

"You would have no concerts because we would be unable to make guarantees necessary for booking," he said.

Lectures, including those by Joe Clark, Zev Kedem and Timothy Leary, were also made possible with fee money.

Issues and Ideas, the committee responsible for many of the large lectures on campus, had 237 students attend programs in 1993-94.

"In 1994-95, we had attendance of 1,300 or more at three lectures," Carney said.

Other programs were also given a financial boost by the fee.

"We were able to offer more subsidies on our outdoor trips so students didn't have to pay as much," Carney said.

UPC was also able to bring more newly released movies to campus and plan special movie events like the Star Trek movie marathon and this year's Bogie and McCall event.

About 16,135 people attended movies in Forum Hall last year, he said. Movie attendance averages about 620 people each weekend.

Carney said a user-fee system could increase the cost of UPC events and force UPC to cut programs.

"If we went to a user-fee system, our fee would dramatically drop," he said. "Students want to pay the least amount possible."

Carney said he understands the need to justify how fee money is spent, but he said he thinks the idea of a user-fee system is archaic.

"It would devastate the UPC budget. The programs themselves would shut down."

If students attend three UPC events in a semester, such as a lecture, an art exhibit and one special event like human bowling, they will have had three events for $2.

User fee would limit UPC

Students pay $2 for the Union programming fee each semester that allows free admission to Union Program Council lectures, art exhibits and special events. The fee also subsidizes other entertainment events, such as theater performances, giving students half-price tickets.

Some student government members have proposed making the Union programming fee a user fee so that only students who attend UPC-sponsored programs would have to pay to attend. Although each student would save $2 a semester with a user fee system, the cost of UPC events to students could increase and force UPC to cut programs.

With the user-fee system,

- UPC would not be able to afford to have concerts like Soul Asylum.
- Newly released movies and special movie events like the Star Trek movie marathon at Union Forum Hall would happen less frequently.
- Subsidies for UPC-sponsored outdoor trips could be reduced or eliminated.

PETERS

"Dr. Peters was an incredible force throughout his 36 years of service to the University," Bosco said.

"He affected the lives of countless K-State students and faculty. His impact, particularly in the area of student affairs, can be felt even today throughout the University system."

Not only was Peters influential in national educational organizations, he contributed his time and effort to the students at K-State.

From 1954 to 1985, he was the faculty adviser to both the Blue Key senior honorary and to Student Government. He was also a member of the Athletic Council from 1962 to 1975 and chaired many University councils and committees.

Peters retired in April 1985 as K-State's vice president for student affairs, a position he had since 1967. During his tenure at K-State, he had also served as assistant dean of arts and sciences and dean of students.

Several programs and scholarships have been created in his name in addition to the Rec Complex.

In 1983, the College of Education started the Chester E. Peters Lectures in Student Development. These lectures provide an opportunity for both K-State students and faculty to interact with outstanding scholars in the education field.

PETERS MEMORIAL

- A memorial service for Chester E. Peters will be at 10 a.m. Thursday at the First Methodist Church, 612 Poyntz Ave. The service will be open to the public.

Blue Key also established the Chester E. Peters Scholarship for Student Development in his honor. The award is given each year to the student who has contributed most positively towards the development of other K-State students.

During the civil rights struggle of the 1960s, Peters dedicated his time in working with students and townspeople to find peaceful solutions to problems.

Peters, at one point, convened a meeting and invited all Manhattan landlords. He then requested they sign a pledge that they would not discriminate in housing.

The University took the stance that anyone renting to students should comply. Students were asked not to live in housing where the landlord refused to sign the non-discrimination pledge.

Lecturing to the K-State Historical Society in 1984, Peters said several changes were accomplished through dissent in the 1960s.

"It did have an impact. We did change policies in ROTC. Students did get more heavily involved in what was happening to themselves in the educational and social environment, and every other aspect of this campus," Peters said.

"Members of the University community were brought to higher levels of sensitivity for women, women's rights, women's studies, human dignity and minority concerns. If we are not touched by some event or some happening, we go back to doing what we did — we do not change."

A memorial service will be at 10 a.m., Thursday, at the First Methodist Church, 612 Poyntz Ave., and is open to the public.

"During his years of service at K-State, Peters gained the admiration and respect of countless K-State students who were moved by his warmth, gentle humor and caring attitude," Bosco said.

"His ability to extend an understanding of the real meaning of goodness as a human quality is his legacy to learning."

RUN

information. Its goal is to find a cure for the most common forms of leukemia by the year 2000.

"We are the single largest contributor for the leukemia fund in Kansas," Mayes said. "We raise money by sending people from our houses to get contributions from individuals and companies."

A donor who gives more than $200 will become a significant donor, Mayes said.

The donor's name will be printed in the Manhattan Mercury, and the company logo will be printed on the Fiji T-shirts, Mayes said.

"Of any greek fundraiser, Fiji Run for Leukemia raises the most money," he said.

K-State Fijis raised $11,000 and KU raised $11,000 last year, totaling $22,000, Williams said.

Raising the money for the Leukemia Foundation brings KU and K-State together for a common goal, Mayes said.

"But of course we are rivals when it comes to the football game," he said.

The run also gives KU Fijis a chance to meet their K-State brothers, said Jason Opie, KU philanthropy chair and junior in business communications.

▶ BICYCLE REGISTRATION

Council considers delay

■ Enforcement might be postponed until spring

Kimberly Hefling
staff reporter

Students with unregistered bicycles might not find their bicycles chainlocked Nov. 1 after all.

Darell Edie, chairman of Parking Council, said he believes bicycle-registration enforcement will not begin in November. Instead, the committee will vote to postpone it until next spring or early next fall.

"We will have a discussion on the 19th, and we'll probably move enforcement to late spring or early fall," Edie said. "We want to get everyone registered. Right now, only 10 to 15 percent of bikes are registered on campus."

Edie said the change is not set in stone, but he is almost sure a change will he made during the council's meeting Oct. 19.

He said the change would be made because of problems related to bike registration this semester and because of opinions expressed to the committee.

Edie said there are three main reasons he thinks bike registration has not been successful.

First, he said, information was not put out last spring about bike registration.

Second, he said, because Union Programming Council dropped the ball, the bike-registration fair had to be delayed. Although three fairs have been scheduled for this semester, the one planned for earlier in the semester did not get off the ground.

Third, he said, Parking Services was not ready the first day of enrollment this year for the bicycle-registration process.

As it stands now, students who have not registered their bicycles would receive a $5 ticket beginning Nov. 1. To enforce the policy, a chainlock would be placed on the bicycle until the ticket was paid.

Edie said the registration deadline was not changed Thursday at the council's last meeting because there was not enough support from students on the committee to reconsider it at that time. In addition, John Lambert, public safety director, was not at the meeting.

Russell Fortmeyer, chair of Student Senate Parking Committee, said he knew about the deadline change last week.

"I talked to the administration last week, and they said the registration deadline was going to be moved back," he said. "The members of my committee went to Parking Council, and they said the deadline was still Nov. 1."

Although the council has influence in making parking policy, it is an advisory group to campus administration and Parking Services.

"Ninety-nine percent of what we advise or ask to be done is done," Edie said.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said he believes pushing back bicycle-registration enforcement is necessary.

"The decision seems appro-

Hale you say? Farrell Library name changes

Qina Buster
staff reporter

When construction is completed in February 1997, Farrell Library will not be opening as Farrell Library. It will be opening with a new name, Hale Library.

The library is being named after Joe and Joyce Hale, who in 1992 committed a lead gift of $2 million for the library renovations. The Hales, who are from the Kansas City area, have been strong supporters of K-State, and several of their children are K-State graduates. Joe Hale is president of ADM Milling Company and has close ties to the College of Agriculture.

The gift makes the Hales the largest private donor for the library, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said. Besides just donating the money, the Hales have spoken on the library's behalf to other potential donors, Hobrock said.

Of the $28 million needed for Farrell renovations, $5 million comes from student money, $5 million comes from private donors and $18 million comes from state money, Hobrock said.

Because of the expense involved with construction, the trend of naming buildings after school presidents and officials is changing.

"There is a growing tendency to name buildings after private donors," Hobrock said.

The Kansas Board of Regents considered and passed a proposal to rename Farrell at its September meeting.

"This signifies and represents change. Farrell hasn't had the best connotation. We will leave Farrell behind and open as Hale, and it will be a totally new image and breakthrough," Hobrock said.

Speaker puts prevention 1st

Nikola Zytkow
staff writer

Former U.S. Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders will present "Speaking Your Mind on Controversial Issues" at 7:30 p.m. Thursday at McCain Auditorium.

Elders resigned Dec. 9 after making remarks about masturbation, which were considered risqué, at the United National Conference on AIDS.

"She got fired for discussing a difficult problem on human sexuality openly and honestly," said Phil Anderson, professor of advanced public speaking and member of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Elders

Elders, a pediatric endocrinologist, was the first African American and the second woman to be appointed to the position of surgeon general on Sept. 8, 1993.

"I want to change the way we think about health by putting prevention first. I want to be the voice and vision of the poor and powerless. I want to change concern about social problems that affect health into commitment. I would like to make every child born in America a wanted child," Elders said during her Senate confirmation hearings.

Elders' short-lived term was plagued with controversy from the beginning.

She openly discussed risqué issues, such as studying the legalization of drugs and distribution of contraceptives in public schools. She also criticized the Catholic church for its opposition to abortion.

According to the New York Times, conservative members of Congress and moderate

Senate to discuss fine arts fee

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

User fees could eliminate student discounts on McCain Auditorium tickets and affect the quality of fine arts programming on campus.

The fine arts fee will be up for review by Student Senate this year, and some members of student government have proposed making the fine arts fee a user fees.

User fees mean only the students who use services would have to pay for them. The user-fee proposal is an attempt to reduce the cost of higher education.

McCain Auditorium gets a portion of its revenue from the $8.40 fine arts fee, and the Fine Arts Council distributes the rest of the money to student groups and departments for special projects or programs.

The College of Architecture and the speech, theater, art and architectural engineering departments receive funding from the fee. The money is supposed to be used for projects or equipment that directly benefits students.

Performance groups, such as Ebony Theatre, receive money from the fee because Senate will not fund them with activity fee money. McCain director Richard Martin said the fee money received by McCain is used to

Innocent verdict

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

Danny Tijerina, senior in kinesiology, watches the television at noon Tuesday in the TV room of the K-State Student Union as the jury delivers its innocent verdicts to O.J. Simpson after his nine-month murder trial.

Students cram Union, await verdict

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

The overall feeling was tense as students stared wide-eyed at the television just moments before the jury announced the verdict in the O.J. Simpson murder trial.

Students crammed into the TV room at the K-State Student Union minutes before the jury announced its verdict. There were hundreds of people lining the walls, sitting on the floor and along the windowsill. They even brought in extra benches for the students to sit on, but that wasn't enough to facilitate the crowd waiting to hear the result of what has been called the trial of the century.

"This is pretty phenomenal. All these people. This is something like if a space shuttle crashed or the president got shot," Amy Scott, senior in accounting, said.

People started getting nervous and fidgety moments before the announcement. Many people hushed the crowd to get people to stop talking.

Just before the verdict that set Simpson free was read, the silence was eerie. Many students covered their mouths with both hands, and one girl looked down at her shaking hands.

When the verdict was read,

O.J. fans celebrate decision

Associated Press

ATLANTA — "Right on, O.J. We were with you," members of a black business organization watching the verdict in a conference room cried out.

"The Juice is loose," a black construction worker exulted as he crossed a downtown street where a neighborhood group was setting up a celebratory cookout.

On a subway platform, a black woman hoisted aloft the front page of The Atlanta Journal's hot-off-the-presses final edition so riders on a passing train could learn O.J. Simpson had been freed. Tipping it from side to side, she sang out the headline again and again, "not guilty. Not guilty."

And therein lies a lesson, said the Rev. Joseph Lowery, president of the Atlanta-based Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

"I think white people have to take a new look at how aggrieved and pained the black community is about

PRINTING INCIDENT UNDER INVESTIGATION BY CIS DEPARTMENT

An excessive printing incident that occurred early Friday morning is being investigated by a team from the Department of Computing and Information Sciences.

Charges have not been filed with the K-State Police Department because the team wants to further investigate the incident, Virgil Wallentine, professor and director of CIS, said.

Sheets boldly stating "fba" in horizontal type printed to more than eight printing servers on campus about 3:30 Friday morning.

The incident cost the University time and money by depleting the paper supply in printers across campus, said Harvard Townsend, computer and network system manager for CIS and a member of the team.

Townsend said he had no comment on the progress of the team's investigation.

However, the team has indicated that more than one person could have helped print "fba" from the campus servers.

The campus police department is not undertaking an investigation now.

"Nobody has pressed charges — therefore I'm not obligated to do an investigation," Investigator Richard Herrman said.

If the CIS team discovers the person or people involved in the incident, it might choose to discipline from an administrative level, or report the incident to the campus police, Wallentine said.

However, the team members said they did not want to take any action until more information is available.

FUNERAL CAUSES ADJUSTMENT

The Kansas Student Personnel Conference is adjusting its schedule to facilitate attendance at Chester E. Peters' Funeral.

Peters, the namesake of K-State's Rec Complex, died of an apparent heart attack Sunday afternoon.

The conference's keynote speaker, Kit Morris, was scheduled to speak at 10 a.m. Thursday but has been postponed until noon.

About 100 college student personnel will be attending the conference and listening to Morris, former executive director of the Knight Foundation Commission on Intercollegiate Athletics.

Any questions concerning the change should be directed to John Staffen or Diana Robertson at 532-5541.

LECTURE WILL DELAY SENATE

The Student Senate Executive Committee decided to postpone Thursday's 7 p.m. Senate meeting until 8:30 p.m.

The move was made at Senate's Tuesday night meeting to allow senators the option of attending the Joycelen Elders lecture.

Elders, former surgeon general of the United States, is speaking at 7:30 Thursday night in McCain Auditorium as a part of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Her speech, "Speaking Your Mind on Controversial Issues," was partially funded by money allocated by Student Senate.

16-YEAR-OLD GORE GETS MIP

WASHINGTON (AP) —Tipper Gore said Tuesday her 16-year-old daughter, given a ticket last weekend, is wrestling with the public attention as well as the severe disappointment of her family and friends and herself.

Sarah Gore was cited Friday in suburban Montgomery County, Md., after a police officer saw her holding an open beer while sitting in a car outside a party. The driver of the car was not drinking.

Civil citations also were issued to several other juveniles, police said. The maximum penalty for underage possession is $500.

The family is dealing with Sarah's situation privately, Tipper Gore said, talking to her like all families should to their teen-agers about the availability of alcohol and the fact the temptations are out there.

"She broke our rules, and she broke the law. She's extremely miserable and unhappy, I can tell you that," Tipper Gore said.

JUDGE REVOKES BANISHMENT

EVERETT, Wash. (AP) — The judge who turned two teen-age Indian robbers over to a tribal court for banishment revoked the judicial experiment Tuesday and sentenced them to prison.

Superior Court Judge John Allendoerfer said he had seen changes for the better in Simon Roberts and Adrian Guthrie, both 18, since they were banished a year ago to remote Alaska islands.

Allendoerfer sentenced Roberts to 55 months in prison with credit for time served, and Guthrie to 31 months, also with credit.

Glamour tour makes stop at K-State

■ Magazine reaches out to target market

Heidi Evert
staff reporter

Glamour magazine is camped out in front of the K-State Student Union.

They're handing out free shampoo and makeup and letting students sign up for prizes.

"It's a very good opportunity to see all of the products that are out there on the market and sample them," Kristi Hann, junior in occupational therapy, said.

LeAnne Horton, sophomore in clinical psychology, also said the booths were a good opportunity.

"I just thought it was a good opportunity to get some free stuff," she said.

It is all a part of Glamour's Elements of Success tour, which is hitting 10 college campuses between New Jersey and California.

"We're here to give you guys real-life knowledge and real-life experiences," said Kate Alaimo, associate merchandising editor for Glamour.

GLAMOUR
▶ The Elements of Success tour will be 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. today in front of the K-State Student Union.

The campus geography, enrollment, academics, leadership and spirit were considered when Glamour chose which colleges to visit.

The advertisers represented at the tour adopted elements that defined success, according to a survey Glamour sponsored last year.

Glamour asked college students across the United States to define elements of success.

"Each advertiser, in a sense, adopted one of these elements," Alaimo said.

Image, determination, attitude, personal style, balance, setting goals, motivation, intelligence, good health, hard work and giving back were all important elements, according to the survey.

In the Hard Work booth, students could win $1,000 toward a new computer.

In the Giving Back booth, Vans Shoes is giving away mirrors in exchange for old shoes.

The old shoes will be donated to shelters.

You can also learn how to wear your hair and makeup for interviews.

Alaimo said she thought these are things most students do not think about.

Alaimo said student response to the tour has been great.

"The response has been phenomenal," Alaimo said.

Owen Stanley, senior in social science, said he wondered why men weren't included.

"I noticed it was all for women and how there was so much emphasis on how a girl looks, and I was wondering why they didn't do anything for guys," Stanley said.

Glamour's Elements of Success tour will be 10 a.m. until 4 p.m. today in front of the Union.

Sex offender returns to court

Nolan Schramm
desk editor

Convicted sex offender Mark Hansen returned to Riley County district court Tuesday for a preliminary hearing on charges of aggravated indecent solicitation of a child.

Hansen was arrested March 31 for violating conditions of his Pottawatomie County probation after he gave a sexually explicit letter to an 8-year-old girl.

Riley County lists Hansen as a regular sex offender under Kansas law.

Hansen posted bond and now lives at 2419 Anderson Ave., a few blocks away from the schoolyard on which he was found loitering earlier this year.

Excerpts from letters Hansen wrote an 8-year-old Riley County girl were read at the hearing, which was conducted to determine whether there was probable cause that a felony was committed and whether there was probable cause that Hansen committed it.

The judge will decide within the week whether the case will go to trial.

The majority of the arguments focused on testimony of Detective Theresa Mason, Riley County police officer, and the details of her interview with Hansen.

The interview was conducted days after Hansen gave the girl, whose family wished not to be identified, a letter after she had come to his door to promote a school fund-raiser.

Cross examination brought out that the first letter had been given to the girl and that the second letter had been delivered to the girl's mother, prompting the mother to call the police.

In the letters and interview with Mason, Hansen said he had died in a car wreck in 1978. After his death, Hansen said he was reincarnated by God to come back to earth.

Hansen said he believed the 8-year-old girl and her mother were actually his wife and daughter from a former life who now wanted nothing to do with him.

He said this made him sad.

He also said God had given him a gift to have sexual intercourse with females who were moved by the spirit and who asked the correct question.

When Mason asked what the question was, Hansen said it was "Will you fuck me?"

After the question was asked, Hansen said he would be able to have sex with a girl. He also said he was instructed by God not to have sex with girls who had not yet reached puberty.

With those girls, he could only have intercourse using his tongue.

When Mason asked Hansen during the interview to clarify this statement, he said, "I can do miracles with my tongue on young girls." He then stuck his tongue out at Mason.

During this part of the testimony, Hansen sat motionless by the side of his defense attorney.

Hansen's attorney conceded his client had said all of the things Mason said he did. However, Hansen's attorney said that Hansen did not directly threaten the girl and that the second letter was not given directly to the girl but to her mother.

The closing statements of the prosecution were skeptical of Hansen's story of reincarnation.

"This man said he died in 1978," the prosecutor said.

Hansen turned to his attorney and said, "'Cause I did."

"He solicited her through letters to attempt to get her to have sexual intercourse with him," the prosecutor said.

"Bull-fucking-shit!" Hansen yelled as he struggled to his feet on a braced leg. He threw his arm out in anger and then dropped to his knees in front of the defense's table, his hands folded in front of him in what looked like prayer.

His attorney soon whispered to him to stand up and then gave his statement. He then asked the court to bind his client on intent.

Hansen had originally been on probation stemming from a Sept. 10, 1993, arrest for aggravated indecent liberties with a child in Pottawatomie County.

Pottawatomie County withdrew its original request to revoke his probation and incarcerate him.

In a May interview with the Collegian, Pottawatomie County Attorney Jeff Elder said this action was taken because sentencing guidelines would have allowed him back on the streets in 10 months.

▶ CITY COMMISSION

City supports bonds for new company

Cori Cornelison
staff reporter

The city voiced support for proposed industrial revenue bonds and property-tax abatement for Troy Design and Manufacturing Co. last night.

The city approved an incentive package Sept. 20 for TDM, based in Redford, Mich., to build a $10-million electric vehicle plant in Manhattan.

The plant is scheduled to open Feb. 15 and will be located in the current Manhattan Industrial Park, which is in Pottawatomie County.

The approved package included the issuance of up to $4 million of bonds and a 10-year, 100-percent tax abatement as long as TDM meets the minimum employment levels stated in a contract with the city.

Bob Rawson, Pottawatomie County commissioner, said Pottawatomie County is pleased with the city's decision of a 100-percent tax abatement for 10 years for TDM.

The property-tax abatement will amount to about $416,000 over 10 years for the city. The cost-benefit analysis the city prepared shows the city can make up lost revenues in eight years.

The contract says in order for TDM to have a 100-percent tax abatement, it must meet minimum employment levels of 50 in 1996, 70 in 1997, 90 in 1998 and 138 in 2000.

If TDM does not reach its minimum levels, then it will be responsible for an initial 20-percent property tax, plus 1 percent for each employee it does not hire.

For example, if TDM only hires 86 employees in 1998, it will pay 24 percent in property tax.

The incentive package also includes $550,000 for job incentives, a $418,000-revolving loan for the next 10 years at no interest from the Economic Development Fund.

The fund was created with money from a half-cent sales tax that was approved by voters in November.

The second reading of the ordinance will be Oct. 17, provided TDM has obtained a purchaser for the bonds and secured a trustee bank.

This means cyclists still won't know much about registering their bikes if they want to or even if they go to the bike fair.

The Parking Council's indecisiveness has reached the point where students don't know which conflicting report to believe.

Parking Council originally announced the deadline for bike registration last spring. It was to be Nov. 1.

This date was chosen because time was needed to inform K-State bicyclists about the registration process and because the Parking Council could not be prepared to have registration any sooner.

Parking Council planned a bike fair to inform students of the particulars of registration. This bike fair is scheduled for Friday.

Now, Darell Edie, head of the Parking Council, has said the deadline for registration is going to be reconsidered and will probably be changed.

The problem with this is that the Parking Council will reconsider the matter at its next meeting — Oct. 19.

This means cyclists still won't know much about registering their bikes if they want to or even if they go to the bike fair.

There are good reasons for the Parking Council to move the deadline back. The extra time will can be utilized to inform students about registration. The Parking Council could then get a better turnout.

A better reason for pushing the deadline back would be the availability of bicycles to register. If the deadline would be set for fee payment in fall '96, students would be more likely to have their bikes in Manhattan.

Whether registration is set for next fall or next week, students must be given a definite answer about when this is to take place, especially if the Parking Council wants bike registration to be successful.

English resists strict definition

America is not a land of singularity; no one can deny that many faces and ethnic heritages exist within its borders.

For many years, it was taught and accepted that English was the national language, as well as the heritage of a nation run by politicians elected by a faction of the populace.

Those in power dictate the status of a nation, and so it follows in logic that their institutions' customs and language loom well over other factors of America's development in history books and popular culture.

It is not necessary, in all actuality, for Bob Dole to assert that English be the official language spoken in America: It already is.

It is true that by the year 2000, America will be roughly half Caucasian, and the rest of the population will be made up of immigrants from other countries, such as Mexico, South America, the Middle East and Asia.

COLUMN

JUSTIN WILD

Not all of America will want to speak English, but in order for any semblance of prosperity to occur, the incoming cultures will need to have some knowledge of the language to function well in the society to which they have come.

With what is referred to as white-man's paranoia, individuals seem once again eager to put up barriers.

However, lest we forget, our country has been made up of various cultures from its colonization; the many faces of Europe contrast with the different tribes of Native Americans.

When a politician speaks of unifying such a diverse people under one language, it is not an attempt to orchestrate a linguistic harmony. Rather, it is an attempt to further alienate a divided nation and keep a grip on an institution that is perceived to be crumbling.

Casting aside whether English is made the official language, the real question is this: Whose English are we now speaking?

Proper English, the likes of which can be found in many textbooks, is not the standard by which we speak. Just by channel surfing on television, many faces of the English language can be heard.

In some circles, the English spoken is nearly unintelligible to another American simply because of slang. It is an accepted fact within the country that, depending on the region one is in, the dialect and speed at which the common language is spoken makes it hard to understand.

In language, a certain common ground might exist, but we ignore the fact that language is constantly changing. Some might hold the opinion, due to various influences like MTV, that our language is rapidly collapsing into a mishmash of English and street slang.

However, language is like any other scientific phenomenon because it evolves. Language's evolution is fascinating because it not only involved regions but today also relies on the dictation of popular media and fads.

Although they might be resisted, the tides of change cannot be stopped. For networks to remain on top, they have started broadcasting shows that highlight cultures and their varying forms of English, further influencing the way we speak and think.

The unending construction of the information superhighway has produced buzzwords that are now common among the growing amount of people traveling on the Internet.

We ask incoming cultures to adapt to our culture, but we fail to recognize that we also adapt to their cultures.

We might believe our stubbornness will keep us from accepting other languages as our own, but we will no doubt pull some of the languages' syntax present in America today into English.

We don't have a decision about Social Darwinism when it concerns our language or anything else; the changes that occur aren't published anywhere because they are gradual. Language might be chosen by a group, but its nature and science aren't directly governed by those who speak it.

Fred Phelps abuses right to free speech

Former Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders is going to speak at K-State Thursday, and word on the street has it your favorite disbarred lawyer and mine, Fred Phelps, is going to be here, too.

He plans to protest Elders' visit because of her stand on sex education.

Phelps has also been known to show up at the openings of plays, businesses, funerals and the speaking engagements of the Rev. Pat Roberts.

For those of you new to the area, Phelps is the minister of the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka (the congregation is made up mostly of his family members).

The Phelps clan lives in an insular group of homes, and several of his adult children are lawyers. In the fall of 1994, one of his grandsons tried to get a Topeka school district to allow him to protest with his grandfather for his community-service credit. The request wasn't approved.

He has a national reputation for being a pain in the keister of anyone even remotely sympathetic to the gay-rights movement or any other organization he doesn't agree with, including those that advocate women's rights, abortion rights or no prayer in schools.

No matter where you go, he can and will show up. His family also has a history of e-mailing Kevyn Jacobs just to remind him where he'll spend eternity. Trust me, Fred: Kevyn doen't care.

A little personal story: I got married in May and went on my honeymoon in Orlando, Fla. While we were there, Disney World had its second-annual Gay and Lesbian Day.

Phelps and his merry band showed up at the front gates of Disney World to protest the degeneration of the happiest place on earth and were promptly removed by Disney cops.

The moral of the story: There is no escape.

I'm really, really hoping he does not show up here. It's been a pretty quiet semester so far, and I'd like to keep it that way.

This man has cluttered up airwaves, fax machines and public spaces at K-State before, and I, for one, am sick of it.

Once you've heard him spew his drivel, you've pretty much heard all he's got to say.

My advice is to ignore the man. Go hear what Elders has to say. Don't get in a shouting match with Phelps. I have seen otherwise calm, rational people reduced to a screaming mess trying to talk to this guy. So just don't do it.

COLUMN

KADY GUYTON

It's like the story of Briar Rabbit and the tar baby — to touch him is to be ensnared.

In the event that you must shout back, please remind him that we pay tuition to be here and he doesn't. Also, point out that he's not as young as he used to be and all this hostility can't be good for his heart.

I love the First Amendment; it's my favorite of them all. But I'm starting to feel that this man has abused his privileges. Passing laws will most likely backfire, and there's only so much a restraining order can do.

In the interest of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, let's ignore this nut and try to improve things without the opinions of Phelps. He's been an embarrassment to Kansas for too long.

I have a feeling Phelps and his cronies will try to bring down the wrath of God on me for this column. That's fine; the old curse was starting to wear off. Besides, I have plenty of garlic and holy water so I should be OK.

▶ MILLER INFLAMES ISSUE

Editor,

To Scott Allen Miller: I am your least biggest fan.

On the rare occasion that I pick up the Collegian for something other than scratch paper, I always seem to be treated by your mindless commentary.

Perhaps I just pick up the paper on the wrong days, or perhaps you are printed too much.

Regardless, your piece concerning a new tactic for students to make money was just not right.

Although your aim was to make fun, your article only inflames our little bicycle situation on campus. Pedestrians and cyclists can peacefully coexist on the same sidewalk as long as everyone follows the same safe and neighborly rules of conduct we follow on the highway.

However, if you someday find yourself flat-faced on the sidewalk because some cyclist, obviously ignoring his instinctive pleasure principle, was not neighborly to you, well, my unregistered bike and I won't be sticking around to get sued.

▶ ELDERS MISUNDERSTOOD

Editor,

If you do only one thing to honor Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, I urge you to attend the Lou Douglas Lecture by Joycelyn Elders Thursday evening in McCain Auditorium.

I don't know if it will necessarily create harmony, though.

That's because Elders has been made a figure of fun by media and Rush Limbaugh-types, who are smugly assured that they are not racists when they make fun of her.

I recall her being drummed out of the surgeon general's position for her loose-lipped remarks.

But I remember following the story a little carefully and watching how the sensational headlines about what she said never matched the actual reporting.

She was mocked for supposedly advocating that school children be taught how to masturbate.

However, when you read what she actually said, her idea was only that in sex education classes should masturbation be included when indicating all the options for safety — a little provocative-sounding but hardly a crazy position, although one certain people would try to ban.

If you think no racial discrimination was involved, reflect on someone like Sen. Jesse Helms.

He somehow gets away with loose lips all the time in much more consequential situations, such as an actual physical threat against the president.

The press and the hate talk shows just laugh that sort of thing off (Oh, that Jesse!), where Elders is portrayed as dangerous and stupid.

I urge you to hear her and to use your own judgment instead of the line that has been fed to us by a supposedly liberal press.

The scent of a Rose

Perfumes and colognes can make a person smell seductive, subtle or just plain sexy

Fragrances describe a lot about individuals and their personalities. A little added touch of scent can explain shy, outgoing, creative or even obnoxious traits in a person.

"I wear Beautiful by Esteé Lauder. It matches my personality — I knew it the first time I smelled it," Amy Coulson, junior in marketing, said.

Some women wear perfume because it refreshes them.

"Vivid, by Liz Claiborne, is my favorite. I like to wear perfume because it makes me feel clean," Kelly Mahoney, senior in kinesiology, said.

On the other hand, some women think perfume is what they need to give them that finished look after they've gotten dressed up for a special occasion.

"Perfume is like the icing on the cake. If you look good, then you have to smell good, too," Melissa Darger, junior in sociology, said.

Although some women enjoy wearing perfume to make themselves feel good, others simply enjoy adding a little extra scent for those special men in their lives.

"Ralph Lauren makes the perfume I wear, Safari. It's my favorite, and the guys seem to like it all right, too. As for the guys, if he wears Obsession, then he is absolutely irresistible," Lynn Balthrop, junior in marketing, said.

When it comes to men, wearing cologne is just as essential. Looking good is synonymous with smelling good.

"I wear Horizontal because when the girls walk by, they'll think, 'Damn, he smells good,'" Mike Lawrence, junior in business, said.

For the most part, guys like girls who have a sweet, seductive scent to them. And, of course, they try to measure up with their cologne, also.

"I'm not sure who makes it, but I like girls who wear Poison. And, for me, I like Eternity," Greg Meyer, junior in civil engineering, said.

Calvin Klein is popular for men and women this year.

"Obsession is what I like to wear, and I pretty much like anything Calvin Klein makes," Pat Harbert, senior in recreation and parks administration, said.

> "Perfume is like the icing on the cake. If you look good then you have to smell good, too."
> MELISSA DARGER
> JUNIOR IN SOCIOLOGY

Even though it seems as though most students prefer to wear Calvin Klein products, there are some men who like women to wear more subtle scents.

"I like girls to wear any perfume from Victoria's Secret. The scents are more subtle and a lot more sexy. It's so much better than all that other stuff everybody wears," Larry Keller, junior in business, said.

Some people choose to take a different route and go with more natural scents.

"There is a body shop in Kansas City that has lotions and perfumes that are made out of natural fragrances. I like to wear them because no one else has them. It's just something different," said Christy Clem, senior in human development and family studies.

But some people don't wear perfume.

"I never really got into wearing perfume. I would just rather spend my money on something else," Janelle Lagerstrom, junior in biology, said.

Wearing fragrances seems to have many different purposes and is popular among K-State students. However, is it possible to over do it?

"Wearing cologne is all right, but people need to remember not to cake it on all over themselves. When you can taste your cologne, that's when you know you've gone too far," Keller said.

Choosing the right fragrance can be tricky, but most people have a pretty good idea of what they like — whether it's a sweet, subtle or flowery smell.

"The majority of people who come in know what they want. I just help them choose their perfume based on what type of smell they prefer," said Katherine Muasau, cosmetic personnel at Dillards Department Store.

Students at K-State stick to a lot of the Calvin Klein products. The variety of colognes and perfumes it makes allows individuals to select from a variety of scents.

Jennifer Noisette, cosmetic personnel at Dillards, said the new CK One fragrance that both men and women can wear has been a popular item this year.

"Anything Calvin Klein seems to sell pretty well. It seems to be everybody's favorite," she said.

Common-scents care

Perfumes have been known to seduce, entice, attract and sometimes repel throughout history.

Knowing how your body chemistry reacts with a scent is important in choosing a fragrance, but making your own fragrance enables you to customize it to your preferred fragrance strengths and tastes.

According to the book "Natural Beauty at Home" by Janice Cox, you should never try to make or test more than three fragrances at a time because your nose loses the ability to distinguish the differences between them.

There are six different scent groups: floral, spice, wood, fruit, herbal and exotic. Each person should test all six groups and see which one works best.

Cox suggested a floral scent for everyday wear, a spicy one for evening and a light, fresh citrus scent for outdoor activities and sports.

A small amount of most perfumes goes a long way, so be sure not to over do it.

Small amounts also work as gifts for friends.

When making your own perfume, according to Cox's book, be sure to store them in clean, airtight containers and keep them in cool, dark places because heat and light can affect the aroma. Also, colored jars can work to filter light, which can also affect scents.

Do not use plastic containers to store your homemade scents because the chemicals can alter them.

Your products should last about six months if you follow the above steps.

Cats look just fine heading into Big 8 opener vs. Mizzou

COLUMN

TODD STEWART

All right, the non-conference formalities are out of the way. So let's get it on.

With the Wildcat football team at 4-0 through the non-conference part of its schedule, several questions remain about the 1995 Cats, and several have been answered.

The defense is definitely the strength of the team.

The front seven are suffocating against the run, and the secondary is making the plays against the pass. In addition, the Cats' pass rush has improved each game, and the defensive 11 seem to finally be clicking as a whole. Defensive end Dirk Ochs, defensive tackle Tim Colston, linebacker Percell Gaskins and cornerback Chris Canty look to be shoo-ins for first-team all-Big 8 defense.

Cornerback Joe Gordon, safety Chuck Marlowe and Nyle Wiren are not far behind.

This defense can take the Cats as far as they want to go.

Of course, a little offense never hurt.

Dueling sophomore running backs Eric Hickson and Mike Lawrence have provided a solid one-two punch for the ground attack. Their backups, Andre Anderson and Jimmy Dean, are just as effective.

When past Cat opponents didn't have to look beyond the starting tailback, the 1995 rushing attack comes in all shapes and forms and from all directions.

The receiving corps, as expected, has been phenomenal. Kevin Lockett is all-world through four games and is quickly positioning himself as one of the top receivers in the nation.

As if Cat fans haven't heard "Touchdown, Kevin Lockett," enough already this season, they will have to get use to it. Mr. Lockett will be a frequent visitor the rest of the way.

Fellow receivers Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger are having what might appear to be quiet seasons, but while Lockett grabs the headlines, Running and Schwieger continue to get the job done.

This is undeniably the nation's top receiving threesome.

Appreciate your blessings Matt Miller.

After a slow start Miller is coming around in his first season as a starter.

After what Coach Bill Snyder labeled an average performance in the season opener and a horrendous first half in Cincinnati, Miller has come into his own.

Miller is now looking to more than one receiver on a play and has found his go-to guy in Lockett.

What will be key for Miller as the Cats enter Big 8 play is staying in control. Miller cannot hurt the Cats and cannot try to make things happen all on his own. If he stays in control and waits for opportunities to present themselves, he will be OK. If the defense continues to play the way it has been, Miller does not need to be spectacular, only smart.

Of course I can't talk about Miller with out at least one reference to his hair.

Miller's hair is as pretty as the day the season opened. There is no such thing as a bad hair day in the land of Matt Miller.

And just like Miller's hair, this team appears cool, calm, collected and confident heading into Big 8 play.

Which could be a downfall.

Temple, Cincinnati, Akron and Northern Illinois are hardly Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma and the rest of the Big 8.

For the most part, this team remains untested.

The first true test for the Cats will be if the team can be as cool when facing a third down and 10 at their own 20-yard line against a Nebraska rush when they're down three early in the fourth quarter.

Will Matt Miller be as pretty then?

The question will be answered on Oct. 21.

Volleyball looks to continue winning against Cyclones

■ 13-2 Cat volleyball team takes court after weekend upset of Colorado

Shana Newell
staff writer

Coming off a big victory against Colorado, who was ranked No. 16 last weekend, the K-State volleyball team continues Big 8 play tonight at 7:30 as it prepares to take on Iowa State.

K-State looks to stretch its winning streak to eight consecutive wins as it takes its 13-2 record into Ahearn Field House.

Its current string of seven wins is the longest for K-State volleyball since 1988, when the Wildcats opened that season with eight straight wins. With victories against Iowa State tonight and Oklahoma on Saturday, K-State could extend that streak even further.

The Cyclones come to Manhattan 10-5 overall. That record includes a Big 8 win against Missouri last weekend.

K-State's 13-2 record is the best start for the team since 1978, when the Cats went 12-1-2.

After stomping the Buffaloes last weekend, the Wildcats received 34 votes in the USA Today/AVCA Coaches' Poll. If the poll was extended, those votes would be enough for the team to be ranked 26th in the nation.

K-State Coach Jim Moore looks at those votes and considers them with a grain of salt.

"I'm not sure how the win over Colorado will affect us," Moore said. "I'm sure it helps our confidence, but we have a long way to go. We need to refocus and move on. One thing we can say is we haven't impressed a lot of people because Colorado is still ranked above us in the polls."

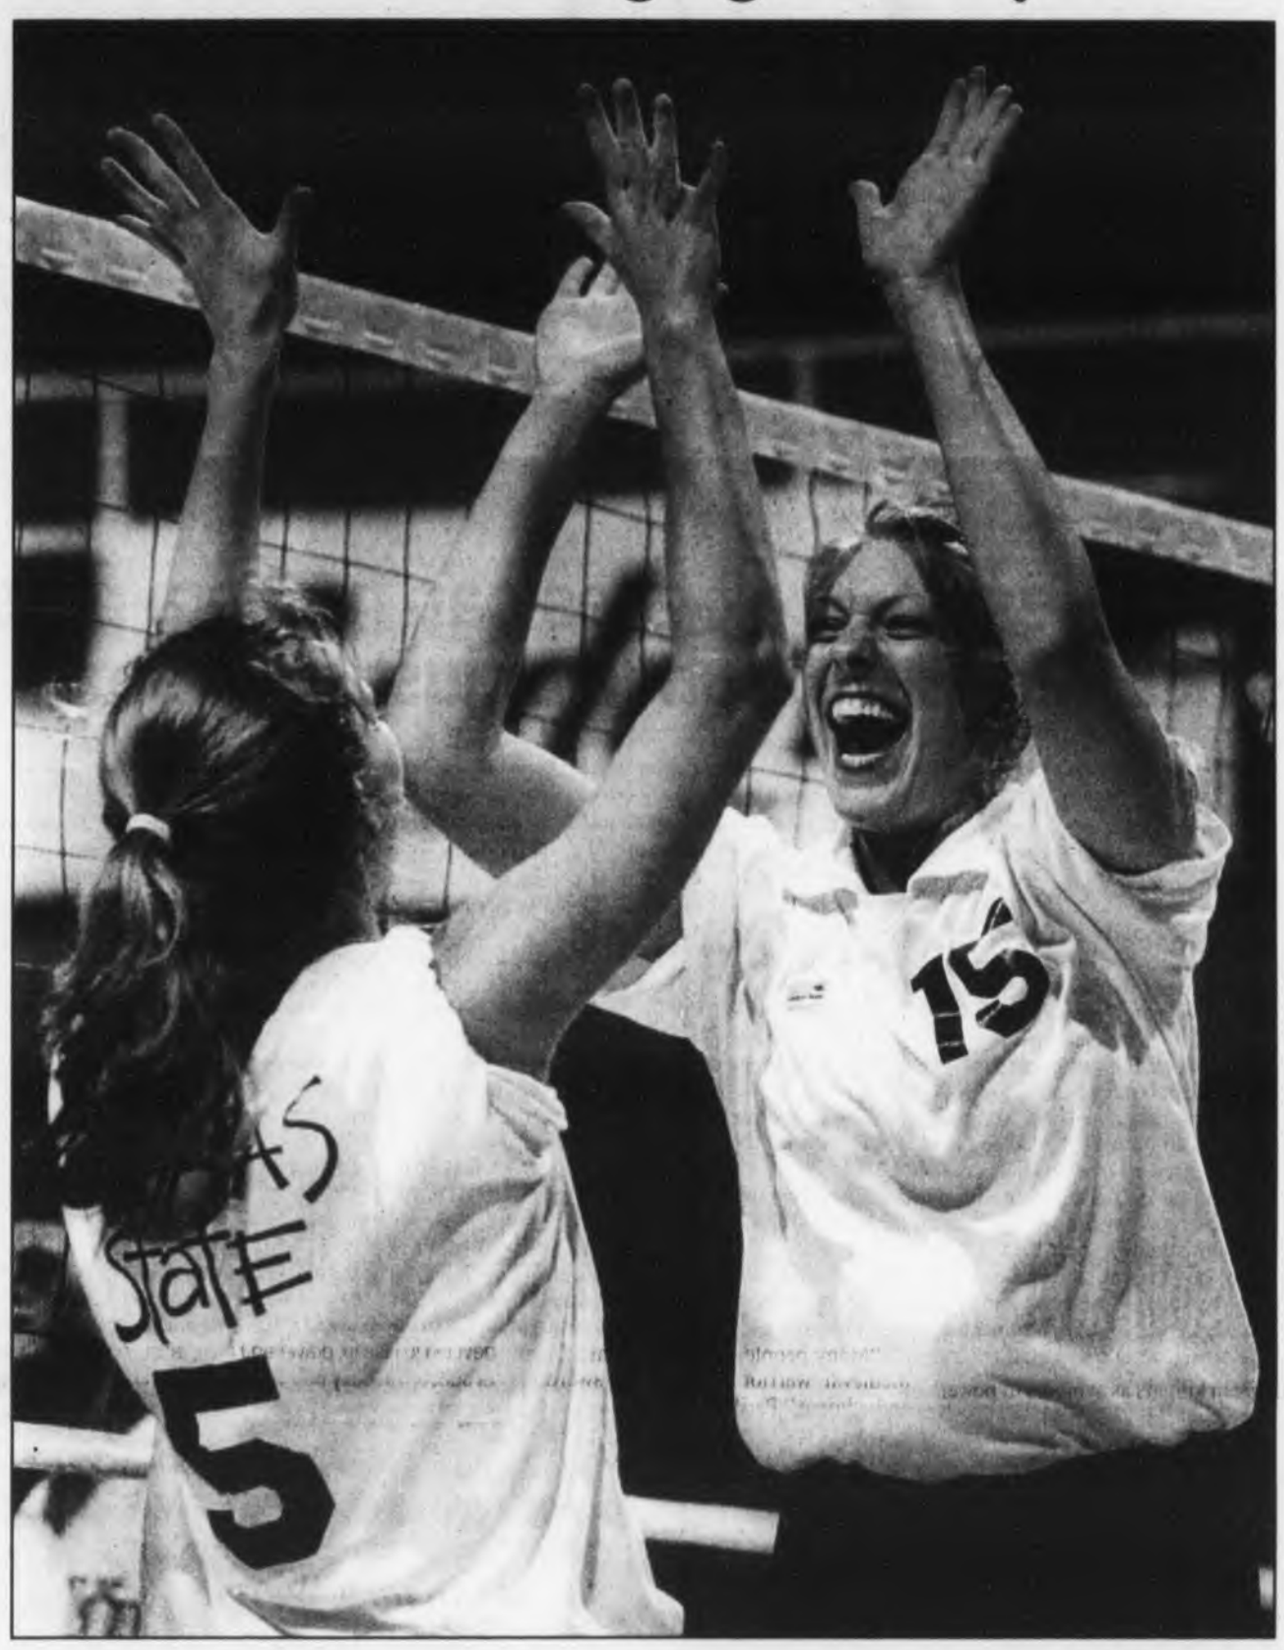
With its loss to the Cats last weekend, the Buffaloes fell four spots to 20th in the Coaches Poll.

In other Cat records, K-State has moved to 12th in the country in blocking and leads the Big 8 in service aces with an average of 2.2 aces per game. Setter Devon Ryning leads the Cats with 25 aces.

Ryning was named Big 8 player of the week after her performances last week against Colorado and Valparaiso.

In last Thursday's match against Valparaiso, Ryning recorded 75 assists in four games, setting a school record. She also had five digs and five block assists.

Against Colorado, she had 61 assists with 10 kills and only one error in 14 attempts, hitting an impressive .643. She also had 22 digs.



After DeClerk received the honor last week, Ryning is now the second player in a row from K-State to capture the award.

The Cats bring in their top guns to meet the Cyclones. Middle blocker Kate DeClerk, play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young, and hitters Jill Dugan, Kim Zschau, Val Phillips and Val Weick are only a few of the players Iowa State will face tonight.

Moore has pulled in a record of his own.

Since coming to K-State last year, he has already won 27 matches as head coach. That total is three more than K-State won in all of the three years prior to Moore's arrival. With the win against Colorado, Moore now has four Big 8 wins since coming to K-State. That equals the number of conference wins the Cats had in four years prior the Moore era.

"I've said all along that this could be the biggest week of the season for us, and I think it is," Moore said.

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Jill Dugan and Val Wieck, 15, celebrate a K-State point last week against Valapriaso. The team takes on Iowa State tonight at Ahearn Field House. The Cats 13-2 record is their best start since 1978.

Snyder weary of Mizzou running back

■ MU's Olivo coming off 222-yard outburst

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

K-State coach Bill Snyder calls Missouri tailback Brock Olivo impressive.

"He's a hard charger, and he plays as hard as he can play every time you snap the football, and he has talent and ability to go with it " Snyder said at his weekly press conference yesterday.

Olivo is coming off a 38-carry, 222-yard performance last week against Northeast Louisiana. The game, which the Tigers won 31-22 to even their record at 2-2, put Olivo over the 1,000-yard mark in his 15th game in Columbia.

Last season, Olivo rushed for 151 yards against the K-State defense in the Cats' 21-18 victory. In the game, then-freshman corner Chris Canty broke up a pass from the K-State 3-yard line to avoid the upset. Of the 12 100-yard rushing performances for Missouri since 1989, Olivo has four of them.

Snyder said the thing that makes Olivo successful is his attitude.

"He's not going to let one person tackle him," Snyder said. "His feet are always moving, and he has an attitude of, 'I want to win, let me be a part of it.'

"You just love to have players who are hard-nosed and play the game like old-timers like myself think it ought to be played."

Although Missouri ranks sixth in the conference in rushing, Snyder is still concerned about the Tigers' attack.

"Offensively, we knew they were very capable of running the ball well, and nothing has changed in that respect," Snyder said.

If K-State stops Olivio, Mizzou might have to go to quarterback Brandon Corso to throws. Corso has completed 48 percent of his passes for 404 yards this season.

Olivo, however, might be tough to stop.

"Brock moves the chains for you," Snyder said. "He gets first downs and gives you big plays on first down to get you in second-and-short situations."

So K-State, which moved up to 13th in the Associated Press poll this week, will face its stiffest defensive challenge of the season.

"Now, with the opponent being Missouri, the true test will really come, and we'll find out if we are as good defensively as the numbers might indicate at this time," Snyder said.

Those numbers indicate K-State has one of the best defenses in the country.

It ranks second in scoring defense, allowing a touchdown a game; second in total defense, 202 yards a game; fourth in rushing defense, 70.5 yards a game; and sixth in pass-efficiency defense.

K-State leads the Big 8 in scoring defense, pass-efficiency defense and total defense.

Missouri coach Larry Smith said he doesn't think the Cats' defense is overrated.

"They have a tremendous amount of quickness and experience in both the secondary and up front," Smith said.

Smith said the Cats are better than the 1994 team that went 9-3.

"Overall, they're a better team than they were a year ago," Smith said. "This is by far the very best football team we've seen all year and for quite some time.

"Last year, we played them nose to nose, and, although I think they're a better football team this year, I think we are, too."

Tennis struggles at Clay Court Championships; Big 8 Indoors up next for squad

Rich Pefley
staff reporter

The K-State women's tennis team is home after a four-day stay in Baltimore for the SkyTel Clay Court Championships.

K-State newcomers Lena Piliptchak and Yana Dorodnova were both eliminated in the first round of singles qualifying competition.

"They both fought pretty hard and have a new appreciation for the level of play in college tennis," said head coach Steve Bietau.

Sophomore Dinah Watson was the only Wildcat woman to escape the first round of singles play at the clay courts. Watson lost in the second round.

Senior Karina Kuregian continued to struggle.

Kuregian, seeded 14th in the main draw of singles play, was routed in the first round by Laura Zifer of Duke 6-0, 6-2.

"She struggled to find some confidence," Bietau said.

"I feel like to have a good chance to win, it's important to play every point like it's a match point, and she was unable to do that."

Up next for the Kuregian and the Cats is the Big 8 Coaches Indoor Championships in Topeka starting on Friday.

Friends, colleagues react to the Simpson verdict of innocent

■ Players, coaches, fans see Simpson acquited

Associated Press

Fans cheered in Buffalo, site of some of O.J. Simpson's most glorious moments in football. But the reaction of the football world was as varied as the public reaction to Simpson's acquittal Tuesday on murder charges.

In Buffalo, hundreds of people packed a bar owned by Bills quarterback Jim Kelly, and most reacted with delight when a Los Angeles jury found Simpson innocent of killing his ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend, Ron Goldman.

"I'm definitely happy. I guess you could say I'm happy because I know the way O.J. was," said Kelly, who was at Rich Stadium in Orchard Park, N.Y.

"I knew him even before this, but my heart goes out to the two families of the deceased. Knowing O.J. the way I did, it was hard for me to believe that he did it."

That was the reaction of the mostly white crowd at Kelly's Sport City Grill.

Patrons were hushed and tense as they watched the verdict that freed one of the city's most revered sports heroes read on more than a dozen televisions throughout the establishment.

On hearing the first "not guilty," bartenders gave each other high-fives while patrons hugged each other and wept.

"I was very relieved," James Binner, the bar's manager, said. "The anxiety in the room was unbelievable."

Elsewhere, coaches and players showed a strong interest in the verdict.

In Kansas City, Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer, who played for Buffalo, interrupted his weekly press luncheon to watch it. A Chiefs aide had been told to monitor the television and interrupt the gathering when the verdict was to be announced.

But the reaction was muted.

Running back Marcus Allen, who, like Simpson, won the Heisman Trophy at USC and was married in Simpson's Los Angeles home, has steadfastly refused comment throughout the trial and had no comment on the verdict.

Schottenheimer's only comment was: "I learned a long time ago that if you don't have information, you shouldn't have an opinion."

Reggie McKenzie, an all-Pro guard who blocked for Simpson in Buffalo, said from Seattle, where he is director of player programs for the Seahawks, "All in all, from day one, I was the person that believed in O.J.'s innocence. I always said he was not guilty, and I think that's documented.

"I'm happy for O.J. and his family, and I really feel for the Brown family and the Goldman family," McKenzie said.

"They cannot replace the two people that they lost, and it's very unfortunate, and I really hope the killers are found."

But he said that he believed Simpson would continue to suffer.

"I think there will always be a cloud over his head," McKenzie said. "Even if somebody came out today and said, 'Hey, I did it,' there will always be some people who will think that O.J. had something to do with it, and I don't think he'll ever be able to live that down."

Welcome to Bill and Hillary's corner on the Web, "Welcome to the White House."

This page gives proof the government can do a good job at something if it is constantly watched. Both Clinton and Vice President Gore have recorded messages that can be downloaded or viewed in text form. (Sorry, Hillary never recorded one.)

The page includes an archive of speeches, important documents and the president's policies on health care, jobs and many other issues. The page's designers are working on a complete map of Washington, D.C., to help all you would-be terrorists. Links to most of the other federal home pages are stashed in the executive branch section.

The worst part of this page is the "First Family" section, which has more cutesy photos of the Clintons than the law should allow. It looks like this section was put together by Bill and Hillary's campaign manager.

Gov. Bill Graves

(http://homepage.databank.com/~governor/HomePage.html)

Gov. Bill Graves and his wife, Linda, have also joined the Web community. The governor's page is a good page if you need to write a paper on the governor. Bill and Linda's life history are easily accessed here, along with the governor's current speeches and articles.

The most impressive aspect of this page is the picture archive. The page includes pictures of Bill and Linda, and historical photos and history of the capital, USS Topeka and the Kansas House and Senate.

The site has a links page for Kansas sites that is a good starting point to learn more about Kansas.

U.S. Treasury Department

(http://www.ustreas.gov/treasury/homepage.html)

The Treasury Department has an interesting page because you can find information about the Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service, U.S. Mint, and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms — it has to be a fun place.

The page designers have included an interesting press release about the weapons the Branch Davidians at Waco possessed.

If you are into what is going on economically in the United States, the Treasury Electronic Library has every report the Treasury Department puts out.

It is updated daily just in case you suffer from insomnia often.

Central Intelligence Agency

(http://www.odci.gov/cia)

Everyone's favorite intelligence department is now easier to contact. The CIA has put together the most useful government page on the Net.

Along with the normal information on what the CIA is supposed to do and pictures of who is in charge, they have included the "1994 World Factbook" in their publications section.

The "World Factbook" is the most comprehensive listing of every country of the world with everything anyone ever wanted to know about them. It includes maps of the countries, government systems, people's beliefs and even any international disputes in which the countries are involved. This is a great resource.

One thing that annoys me about this page is the declassified documents and map section. No, the documents are not on-line to be viewed. The CIA gives all the information needed to order them for a fee.

Institute for Better Education Through Resource Technology

(http://colossus.net/civix/)

This is not a site sponsored by the government, but it is the best look at the federal budget on the Net. The institute is an easy way to navigate the mess of all the expenditures.

Correspondence, politics gain accessibility

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

For those who like to keep up to date on politics and make their opinions heard, it has just gotten easier — or at least quicker.

Kansas politics is now on the Internet.

Gov. Bill Graves and Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., have posted their own home pages on the World Wide Web. They both have e-mail addresses, making correspondence swifter.

"This technology will make it easier for Kansans to access information about the actions of their government," Graves said. "A well-informed citizenry is good for society in general and for government in particular."

Graves' page, which has been operational since March, includes biographical information about the governor and allows users to read his State of the State addresses and weekly newspaper columns.

It also lets users learn about actions the Kansas Legislature has taken on his proposals.

The page is updated regularly and contains links to other Kansas-related pages.

Brownback has also made use of this popular form of communication.

"As I have traveled around the district, I have received numerous requests for our e-mail address," Brownback said. "I am glad we can provide this service to the people of eastern Kansas. It will help serve as a critical link in the communications process between me and the people of the 2nd District."

Brownback's home page includes information on his proposals, constituent services and biographical details.

Brownback's press secretary, Jackie McClaskey, said e-mail is a good way for people to let Brownback know of their opinions quickly if there is a vote coming up.

At this time, neither Kansas Sens. Bob Dole nor Nancy Kassebaum have official pages on the Web or e-mail addresses, although Bob Dole's campaign just came on-line with the "Official Bob Dole for President World Wide Web Site."

Dole's campaign site includes biographical information, a library of speeches, news releases, voting records and a form for making donations to the campaign.

If you are interested in finding out the phone number, mailing address or e-mail address of any senator or representative, you can find that information on Policy.Net.

Use the page's guide to the U.S. Congress to search for representatives and senators by house, name, party, state and committees.

Connections made in cultures

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

Samurai warriors stood atop the Japanese culture, peering over their dominion.

In much the same way, history depicts Western lawmen and European knights as symbols of power and prestige, Mark Parillo, professor in history, said at a Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week lecture Tuesday.

The connections between the Western and Japanese cultures lie within the boundaries of these ancient images.

"The power of imagery can be used to promote harmony between different cultures," said Parillo, who spent a year studying in Japan.

The samurai and geisha in the Japanese culture can be compared to to many counterparts in the Western culture.

"The geisha is the Western equivalent to movie stars or the supermodel," Parillo said. "We have idealized these individuals as the perfect person in our eyes."

After industrialization, the geisha represented the ideal woman in Japan, he said.

Geisha's were experts in the art of conversation, singing and playing instruments.

However, Japan's ancient images have been twisted through the course of history.

"Many people see the samurai as a medieval warrior with a long sword and a horse," Parillo said.

Samurai had a lord or master that gave the warriors land, which was considered the highest source of wealth, he said.

"They owed their lord everything," Parillo said.

Parillo also said the samurai warrior, Western lawmen and knights of Europe were similar because they worked within an honor code.

Western culture was based on Christianity and emphasized the individual. Japanese culture was influenced by Confucius and focused on family and the community, Parillo said.

But the diversity of each culture should be used to create harmony, he said.

"We should celebrate diversity between cultures, but we should also understand that diversity and harmony are not mutually exclusive."

FEE

help pay for performances. McCain received $82,352 from the fine arts fee last year.

"It's used to pay a portion of the fees of the people who perform in the series," Martin said.

McCain is also able to offer tickets to students at a 50-percent discount through the fee subsidy, Martin said.

Forty-five percent of the tickets sold last year were sold to students, Martin said. The other 55 percent of the tickets were sold to the general public, senior citizens and children. About 18,000 tickets were sold last year.

Turning the fine arts fee into a user fee would change the nature of the programming McCain is able to offer, he said. It would also be difficult to track students who benefit from the programs. Students would no longer be able to purchase discounted tickets, and the types of programs brought in would be different, he said.

"Performing arts have not been able to make it on ticket prices," Martin said.

The subsidies from student money help support those programs and make the performances possible.

Martin said the attitude of people who don't think they should pay for something they don't use is a real issue.

"It's like the childless couple who doesn't want to pay taxes to support the schools because they have no children," Martin said.

The fact that the programs are available and that a portion of the population attends them benefits everyone, he said. Just the fact they are offered makes the community a better place, he said.

David Proctor, speech department chairman, said he was waiting for some concrete answers about user fees from the Privilege Fee Committee.

"We have lots of questions that we're trying to figure out," Proctor said.

Proctor is also a member of the Fine Arts Council.

"We're waiting on Fine Arts Council to talk to some of the people from the Privilege Fee Committee to see how the user fee would work," he said.

The speech and theater departments get money from the fine arts fee for student productions.

"It represents almost half the money we use to produce theater and dance programs at K-State," Proctor said.

Over the past few years, production costs have increased, but the state and the University have not given the departments any more funding. Even the royalties for the plays have increased, he said.

"I know right now that it would have a significant effect," Proctor said.

Peter Wallace, Fine Arts Council chairman, said he thought the user-fee system would have a negative effect on groups that receive money from the council.

"I couldn't imagine campus without our type of funding," Wallace said. "A very heavy portion of campus uses some form of art."

The fee money does not necessarily go toward academic programs, but it does help provide money for extra-curricular activities in the nine-member departments. The council helps fund groups such as United Black Voices, the Taiwanese Film Festival and the New Currents jazz group.

"We usually try to help fund things to benefit students," he said.

The last time the fee was reviewed, the Fine Arts Council was reorganized, Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said. All allocations are made by the council and the transactions come through the Office of Student Activities and Services, he said.

The Allocations Committee Chairman, Chris Avila, looks at all the transactions as they come through the office. In the past several years, computer equipment and other questionable purchases have been made with the fee money, he said.

Tomb said during review of the fee, the Privilege Fee Committee would not only be looking at the quality of the programming provided with the fine arts fee, but also at the spending practices of the council.

User fee would cut fine arts funding

Students pay $8.40 for the fine arts fee each semester. It allows students to get tickets to McCain Auditorium events at half price. The College of Architecture and speech, theater, art and architectural engineering departments also receive funding from the fee.

Some members of the Student Governing Association have proposed making the fine arts fee a user fee so that only students who go to McCain performances would pay to attend. Although each student would save $8.40 a semester with a user-fee system, the cost of McCain events to students would increase, and several departments would lose funding from the fee.

With the user-fee system,

- Students would no longer be able to purchase discounted tickets to McCain Auditorium performances.
- The quality of fine arts programming on campus could be affected.
- The College of Architecture and speech, theater, art and architectural engineering departments could lose funding from the fee.

STUDENTS

many students stood up and cheered. One student put both hands in the air and said "Hell, yeah." But other students booed the decision.

One student yelled out, "He should fry. All the evidence is against him."

The students responded strongly to the acquittal. Many students were shaken.

"I'm still shaken like it was my father on trial," Anna Browning, senior in chemistry, said.

Students buzzed around the room afterwards to discuss their opinions about the verdict.

"I think they made the right decision. Even if he was guilty, there was a lot of mishandling of evidence by the police," Ricardo Byrd-Dixon, freshman in education, said.

"I'm not very happy at all," Jeanie DeArmond, freshman in horticulture, said. "He's guilty — it's a race thing. He had motive and opportunity. There was evidence against him. I'm pretty pissed."

Some students said they were angry because they thought Simpson's fame and fortune were the reasons for his acquittal.

"He got off because he was famous. He was O.J. Simpson. If it would have been some normal guy, he would have been found guilty," Shannon Stapaules, junior in secondary education, said.

"I think they wasted a lot of money on it. I think O.J. just made his biggest TV production in his life," Galen McWilliams, freshmen undecided, said.

Others said they believed Simpson's expensive defense lawyers made it possible for him to be acquited.

"Proves that just because the evidence was there, if you have a big-shot lawyer, you're going to go free," Kristin DeWeese, freshman in architectural engineering, said.

Students were divided before the announcement was made on whether or not there was enough evidence to convict Simpson.

"I think there is so much substantial evidence even though no one saw him," Kent Foust, junior in pre-law, said.

Susanna Pine, sophomore in exercise science and nutrition, said she thought there was enough reasonable doubt to acquit Simpson.

"There's too many pros and cons. There are too many things to doubt, and it's a man's life. I think it was good for the prosecution, but the defense had just as much evidence. There were holes in both cases," Pine said.

Many people questioned whether racism played a part in the trial and the jury's decision.

Leanne Wells, sophomore in bakery science, said she thought the fear of riots kept the jury from convicting Simpson.

"I seriously think the jurors feared for their lives, and that's why they made this decision," she said.

One student argued that Los Angeles Police Department Detective Mark Fuhrman was the real racist in the case.

"Mark Fuhrman was the one that found most of the evidence in the case, and he was a racist," Byrd-Dixon said.

Though people might be talking about the trial non-stop for days, some students said they were relieved the trial was finally over.

"I'm glad it's all over. It's always on TV. Now I can watch my soap operas," McWilliams said.

our criminal justice system," Lowery said.

Skepticism of the Los Angeles Police Department, especially evidence of Mark Fuhrman's incendiary racist statements, resonated deeply with blacks and probably weighed heavily on black jurors, Lowery said.

"If Mark Fuhrman hadn't come into the picture, it might have been easier to stop short of reasonable doubt," he said.

Larry Lewis, who works for an anti-drug program, described his own reaction when the verdicts were read.

"I wanted to dance," Lewis said. "You've got to understand. O.J. came out of the same neighborhoods most of us did. I can identify with him."

But that was not all, Lewis added, offering an explanation repeated by many blacks in interviews: Yes, the judicial system acquitted Simpson, but that only confirmed their doubts all along and proved he should not have been charged.

"African-Americans are still second-class citizens in this country," Lewis said. "We can marry white women, but we're still second-class citizens."

ELDERS

Democrats urged President Clinton to dismiss her.

On Dec. 1, 1994, Elders made comments at a U.N. Conference on AIDS that provoked her forced resignation.

During the conference, Rob Clark, a psychologist, asked Elders about the prospects of a more explicit discussion and promotion of masturbation as a way to lessen the spread of the AIDS virus.

Elders began her answer by saying that she strongly supported teaching sexual education in schools at a very early age.

The lecture, free and open to the public, is sponsored by the Office of Multicultural Affairs, Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lectures, Student Governing Association and the Lou Douglas Lecture. Anderson said the four groups sponsoring the speech paid a total of $8,500 to bring Elders here.

"This is the first time these groups have banded together to bring a speaker here," Anderson said.

priate," Rawson said. "There is not a high percentage of bicycles registered on campus."

He said he believes more of an initiative must be taken to educate students about the new program before enforcement begins.

Fortmeyer said he also supported moving back the registration deadline.

"The reason I think it should be pushed back is because it is not fair to students to start a program in late September with little or no publicity and then, boom, right off the bat, want to charge them for violating the rules," Fortmeyer said.

Although registration is still important, Fortmeyer said he believes it is a wise decision to push back bike-registration enforcement.

"Pushing off bike-registration enforcement allows bike registration to be a part of freshman orientation and part of fall fee payment," Fortmeyer said. "To me, those are two important venues to springboard a new program off of. Finally, then, a lot of people will swallow the pill and register."

In the meantime, he said he and his committee will try to inform students.

"The committee has plans to visit living groups in the next couple of weeks and talk about the registration purpose and the benefits in the program," he said. "People don't know those. For some, it's just all negative."

Parking Services will try to spread information on registration at a bike fair Friday. Students will have an opportunity to register their bicycles Friday during the fair in the free-speech zone outside of the K-State Student Union.

Aggieville's music scene

Is the Manhattan music scene fading fast to competition, no crowds?

From acoustic to jazz to country, more bars are starting to pick up on the live music scene in Aggieville.

But behind the smoky haze of local bars and between the sets of indigenous rock groups, a few people wonder if there is enough business to enable this trend to extend into the future.

Kevin Rahn, owner of Bombers and Bombers Upstairs, said he is trying to shy away from live music.

"I've been doing live music for over two years, and very few times have I gotten enough money to pay for it," he said. "Every time I've done it, I've lost money.

"If you bring in some new person on the block, people in Manhattan really don't support them. A few will, but not enough to support an actual show."

Rahn said this was one of the reasons DowBows, which used to have Bombers' current location, went under.

> "If you bring some new person on the block, people in Manhattan really don't support them. A few will, but not enough to support an actual show."
> KEVIN RAHN
> OWNER OF BOMBERS AND BOMBERS UPSTAIRS

"DowBows was strictly live music Thursday through Saturday, and on Tuesday and Wednesday, they had live comedy," he said. "Within six to eight months, they went bankrupt."

Paying a cover charge at the door for a live band was also a deterrent, Rahn said.

"People are more prone to go to a place they don't have to pay money to go into," he said. "If they do pay money, they want a killer drink special.

"They don't understand the money they pay at the door goes to the band, "Rahn said. "The bar doesn't make money off that. They make it off the selling of alcohol so they can't afford to have killer drink specials."

Rob Goode, owner of Auntie Mae's Parlor, said the bars who serve drink specials make it harder for the bars specializing in live music to make a buck.

"We could have a great band, but if someone down the street runs dollar everything, it hurts us," he said. "We like to promote bands and activities rather than serve cheap drinks.

"I think that shows a lack of imagination if that's the only way they can get people to come in the door. That's not the sole purpose of coming to Auntie Mae's — to get cheap drinks."

Goode said every Wednesday the bar runs live jazz. On Thursdays, 90 percent of the acts are either rhthym-and-blues or blues.

"Occasionally, other bars have a blues band, but it's consistent here," Goode said. "We always have blues and good blues music.

"There's a compilation CD of the five best blues bands in Kansas City, and of those five, this month we've had three. So they're good-quality blues bands."

> "If you go to Lawrence on a Monday or Tuesday night and they have a live band, the bars are packed. Here, if we had a live band on a Monday or Tuesday night, people probably wouldn't even know."
> ROB GOODE
> OWNER OF AUNTIE MAE'S PARLOR

Rather than spend a lot of money on advertising, Goode said the bar tries to stick to one type of music for marketing purposes.

"We've tried to stick with one type of music so we can make a name for ourself. Then we don't have to advertise," he said.

"People may not know who it will be, but they'll know what they're going to hear when they come down," Goode said.

A combination of Manhattan's lack of support for live music and an oversaturation of bars in Aggieville has made the going a little slow recently, Goode said.

"Live music has come and gone," he said.

"I'm not sure what point we're at right now. To be quite honest, it's not going real well now. For some reason, Manhattan doesn't really support live music," Goode said.

"If you go to Lawrence on a Monday or Tuesday night and they have a live band, the bars are packed. Here, if we had a live band on a Monday or Tuesday night, people probably wouldn't even know. I don't know if it will ever get to the point where Aggieville will be like Lawrence."

Travis Masterson, general manager of Club Berlin, said running weekly live music shows is tapping the market.

"There's only so much money the people who go to see live bands have. I see the market being tapped with them running as often as they are," he said.

"I see the market being confused. There's too much all at once and not enough disposable cash to go do it," Masterson said.

"Whoever has a live band that one night that everybody gets money will make a killing," Masterson said.

Pulling in acts from Seattle to Michigan to St. Louis, Masterson said Berlin offers everything from alternative to contemporary to hard-core heavy metal.

He also said the No. 1 punk ska band in the nation has played at the bar.

"We have a wide variety of music," he said. "It's usually stated on the marquee. If it's not stated, then it's contemporary."

Masterson said Club Berlin is looking to keep live music coming and might be looking for somebody big to pull in in the next few months.

> "We get people from all walks of life who settle on one common demominator. Live music is for everybody -- not just the old or the young or the working class."
> MIKE TROUTE
> CO-OWNER OF ROWDY TROUTY'S

Silverado Saloon has set the stage for some record labels and has booked up-and-coming stars to play live on Friday and Saturday nights, Jon Farrell, owner, said.

He said the competition from other bars hasn't been a hindrance.

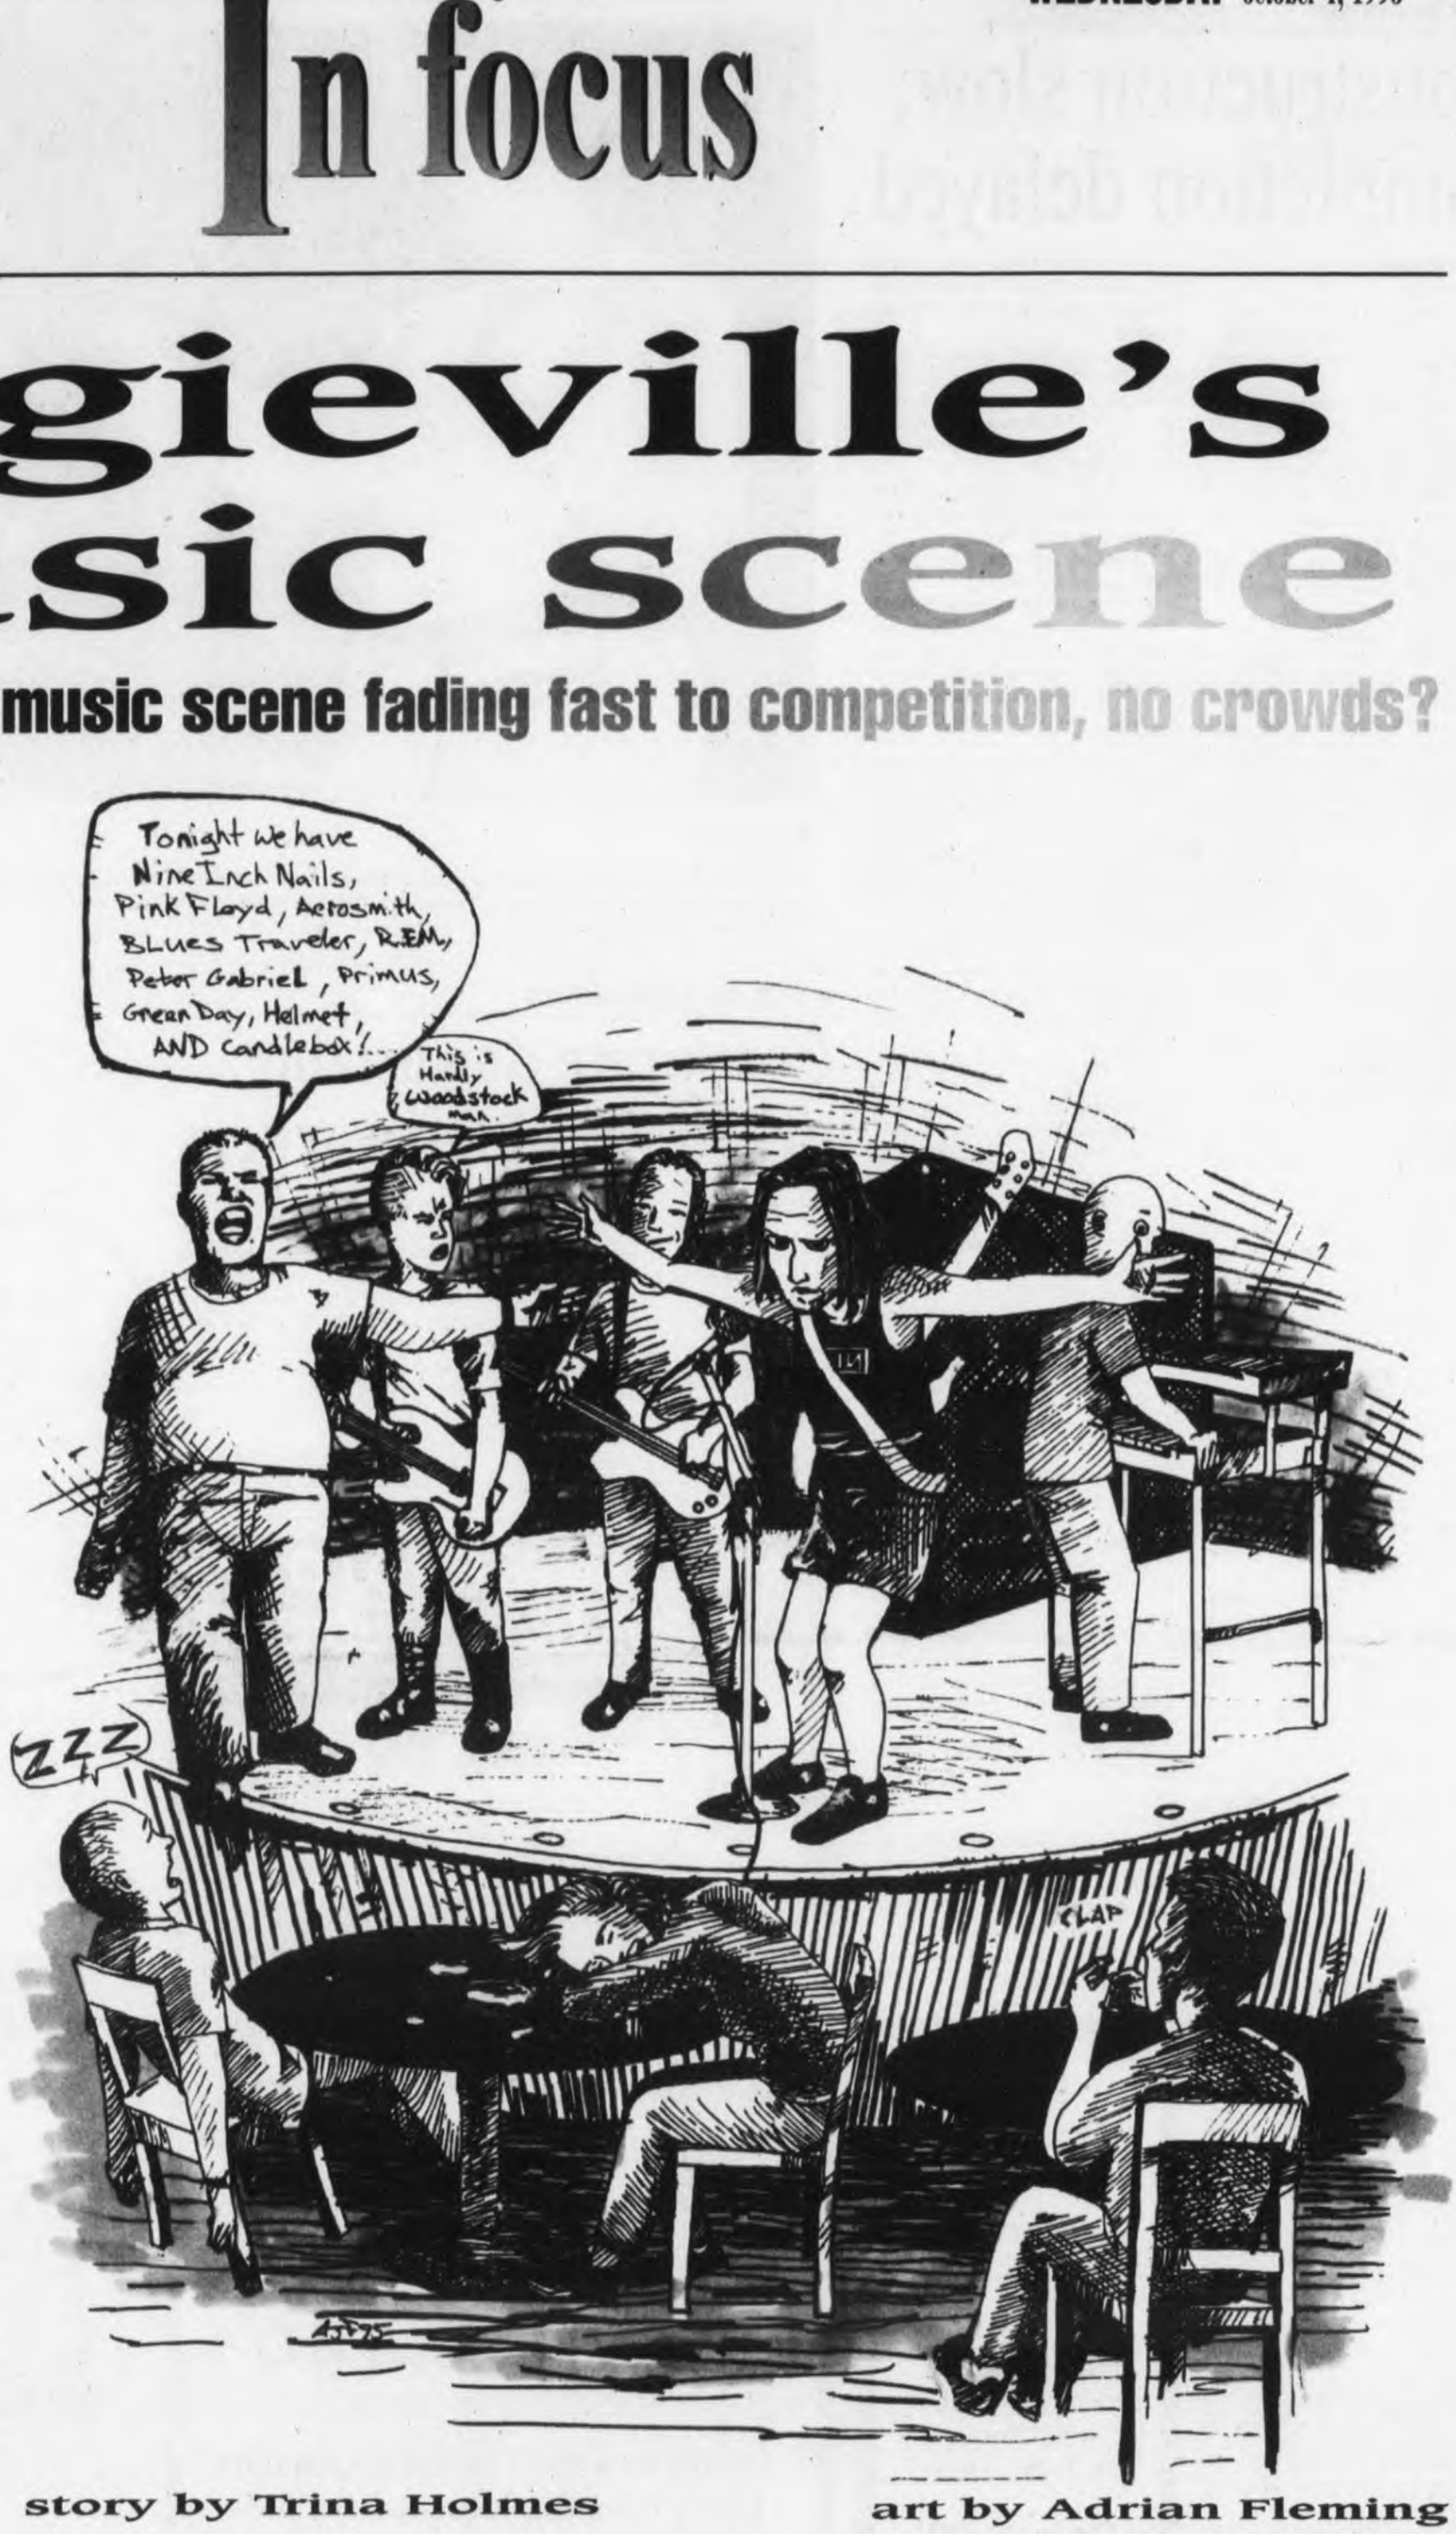
"We're probably the only place in town that books country bands on the weekends," Farrell said. "Other people have blues or jazz, and that typically doesn't affect our crowd."

Live music adds a lot to the weekend experience for people, Farrell said.

"People love to come out and watch someone on stage that's energetic and upbeat," he said. "It adds a dimension you don't have if you're playing music off a D.J."

Mike Troute, co-owner of Rowdy Trouty's, said live music brings a diverse crowd to the bar.

"We get people from all walks of life who settle on one common denominator," he said. "Live music is for everybody — not just the old or the young or the working class."



Getting people to watch bands from out of state has been the only drawback, Troute said.

"Manhattan hasn't been too receptive to bands they haven't heard much about, and that's mainly out-of-state bands," Troute said.

Troute said this was one of the reasons he concentrates on bringing in local acts.

"I'm going to continue doing what I'm doing. I think the popularity of live music will keep growing," he said.

"My business is primarily local talent. There's a lot of talent at K-State, and I'm open for anybody that would like to, to come in and give it a shot."

▶ ART MUSEUM

Construction slow; completion delayed

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art is slowly rising from the ground on the southeast corner of campus.

The art museum, a privately funded facility to house the now undisplayed K-State art collection, has been under construction since spring 1993.

"We have discovered the project is slow," Nelson Britt, director of the museum, said.

Britt said four weeks of construction time was lost because of bad weather in May and early June.

"We were pumping water out of that construction site every day of the month of May," he said.

Britt said the design of the building will keep water from posing any problems once the Beach art museum is completed.

The art museum was designed by Arthur Andersson of Moore/Andersson Architects of Austin, Texas. It is being constructed by Eby Construction of Wichita. The construction of the museum will cost $5 million, which was raised privately.

The initial gift of $3 million came from Ross and Marianna Beach, both graduates of K-State and Hays residents.

Andersson has visited the project a few times since heavy construction began.

Andersson said there have been changes since the initial design, but nothing out of the ordinary for a construction project.

After losing the month of construction to weather, Britt said the parties involved looked at ways to make up the lost time.

"The subcontractors looked at the project very carefully. They went to Eby, the contractor, and requested an extension on the project," Britt said.

Britt said the construction is labor-intensive because most of the building is concrete that is poured in place.

"This building is being cast from the ground up," he said.

Gerald Carter, University architect and director of facilities planning, said the concrete work for the arch gate will be poured in the next few weeks.

"The main museum floor will be poured in the next six to seven weeks," Carter said.

Andersson said he expected that the arch, the proverbial gateway connecting the community to the campus, will be the last thing poured on the lower level.

"They're sort of building the two separate wings or buildings first and then pouring the arch," Andersson said.

Between now and the end of November is the ideal time for pouring concrete, and there will be a lot of exterior activity, Britt said.

Because a majority of the building will be exposed concrete, it is essential that the pours be uniform.

"We've had a couple of pours that were not satisfactory, mainly due to chemistry problems," Britt said.

Carter said the museum is mainly poured with architectural-grade concrete.

"It's always reassuring to have your contractor admit to something he's not happy with and want to redo it," Carter said.

Although the pours had to be redone, it did not affect the construction schedule.

"That just illustrates the great communication between the architect, the owner and the contractor," Britt said.

K-State facilities employees are involved in the project on a day-to-day basis.

Carter said the employees are responsible for offering underground pipeline plans and for shutting power and water service off when necessary.

There have been some minor changes to the project, but nothing that drastically alters the design of the art museum.

Day-to-day project questions go to Bruce McMillan Architects, based in Manhattan. If not resolved there, questions go to Wiedeman Architects of Kansas City, the associate architect to Moore/Andersson.

A lot of design questions go to the architect Arthur Andersson and his project manager, Susan Benz.

Andersson and Benz were last in Manhattan on September 1.

Work on the interior of the museum is weeks away, Carter said.

"Reinforced concrete structures take an enormous amount of form work to support," Carter said.

Right now, that form work is being stored in the lower level of the museum.

"Until the main deck is finished, work on the lower level won't begin," Carter said.

The Beach art museum should be completed in June 1996, a couple of months shy of the original April 1996 target opening.

Although the museum is slated for completion in June 1996, it will not open to the public until September 1996. The exact date is not yet known.

Over the summer, Britt said his staff will be getting the building ready for the opening.

"We can't bring artwork into that building until the environment is perfect," Britt said.

All this shuffling around of completion and opening dates hasn't helped the exhibition schedule.

"The delay was like a train wreck to our exhibition schedule," Britt said.

With the loss of curator Jessica Reichman, who was replaced in August by Bill North, and the exhibition-scheduling debacle, Britt said running the art museum was like a balancing act for some time.

"It kept me dancing," Britt said.

After all the cards fell into place, only one exhibition was lost because of the delay.

The inaugural exhibit, a showcase of the best of K-State's collection, was changed slightly because some of the works were already being used elsewhere, Britt said.

None of the usual problems associated with construction have been deterrents to the excitement of the art museum's completion.

Britt said an additional funding support of $250,000 has been given to the Beach art museum since construction began.

"People are contacting us in regards to donations. Several donations have strengthened the collection," Britt said.

▶ AGE DISCRIMINATION

Corporate downsizing pressures older workers

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Don't tell Betty Deal age discrimination is illegal.

She's well aware of the laws protecting older employees in the workplace, but she also knows what it's like to be middle-aged and suddenly thrust into a fiercely competitive labor market after a corporate downsizing.

Deal said job interviewers are interested in knowing how long the employee is going to work and if that person is going to retire.

"Then they'll say something like, 'We were looking for someone with a little less experience.' What they really meant to say is they want someone younger," said Deal, 56, of San Jose, Calif., who lost her $60,000-a-year management job with a Silicon Valley electronics firm four years ago.

She has yet to find permanent full-time work.

Stable jobs are becoming even scarcer nationwide as mega-mergers in the banking and entertainment industries and corporate restructurings among behemoths like AT&T, Colgate-Palmolive and Merck yield thousands of layoffs.

All ages are at risk. However, unemployment for the 50-plus crowd, many of whom are in the twilight years of their careers and at peak earnings, poses special problems in a decade of corporate cost-trimming and downsizing.

Tunes jazz up Sunday service for churchgoers

Rebecca Schulz
staff reporter

The K-State Jazz Quintet journeyed toward a new musical horizon by fusing religion and jazz in a solidified Big Apple tradition brought home to the Little Apple by Dennis Wilson, professor of jazz studies.

Wilson teamed up with Peace Lutheran Church, 2500 Kimball Ave., to put a little jazz into the church's religious services by bringing musical performers into the church on Sundays.

These services are scheduled at 5:30 p.m. for the first and third Sunday of every month of this year at Peace Lutheran Church, 2500 Kimball Ave., Ray Pickett, pastor of the church, said.

"He (Wilson) called me here late one night after he had returned from playing at a Wichita service. He called me up and said 'We need to have a Jazz Vespers service,'" Pickett said.

Pickett said his congregation was excited about the service.

"We're a very excited, very progressive, creative congregation," he said. "We view this as an outreach to the community, something a little different to reach out to those who might not go to a regular Christian service."

The service did not follow a regular format. It was woven around a theme written by Gabrielle Slater, a baritone saxophone player in the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble. The service contained a few set songs but was largely governed by the emotions of the musicians.

"The hope in the message is that there will try to be something between me and the musicians and hopefully from the congregation," Pickett said extra.

The service was opened by the quintet and followed by a brief greeting from Pickett. The audience then joined in by singing "Lift Every Voice and Sing," and a reading was led by Michael Brown, junior in Physics.

Wilson followed the reading by playing a duet called "Going Home" with organist Bob Edwards .

Wilson played the song as a tribute to the great Count Basie and others in the jazz community who had an influence on his life.

"I thought it was extremely moving. I couldn't even get started on the first song because I was thinking of Basie," Wilson said.

Pickett's message revolved around the theme of jazz and the willingness of people to not be so critical of how others view them.

"What if we become more comfortable with our own imperfections and limitations? Maybe then we could accept others' imperfections and limitations," Pickett said.

Pickett's message was backed up by the quintet. They played to the emotions evoked by the message.

Wilson challenged the quintet at a practice to be ready to play impromptu and to be what he called avant-garde.

"I was pleased with the band and to hear their diverse style," he said. "My goal is to get them to rely on what they learned and to express themselves."

Wilson said students spend a lot of time learning to play from a set script and method, thus losing their ability to be creative.

He said he hopes to encourage his students to be more creative through the Jazz Vespers.

About 60 people attended the service.

Defense attorneys oppose death penalty

Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — Attorneys for Terry Nichols prepared Tuesday to challenge the decision of prosecutors to seek the death penalty against the bombing suspect.

Nichols attorneys Michael Tigar, Ron Woods and D. Kate Rubin were scheduled to argue his case before a meeting of the Justice Department's Capitol Case Review Committee in Washington on Wednesday afternoon.

That committee will hear the arguments as part of its review of U.S. Attorney Patrick Ryan's request for permission to seek the death penalty. The committee then makes a recommendation to Attorney General Janet Reno, who makes the final decision.

Nichols, of Herington, and Timothy McVeigh face federal conspiracy and murder charges for the April 19 bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building. The bombing killed 169 people and injured more than 500.

McVeigh's attorneys sent Ryan a letter last week declining to attend the committee's meetings. They have filed a motion claiming the process is a sham because Reno and President Clinton stated publicly in the days after the bombing that those responsible for the crime should face the death penalty.

Tigar has raised similar objections but said he plans to present arguments to the committee anyway.

Also on Tuesday, Justice Department officials and local federal prosecutors continued their debate on whether to oppose defense motions asking U.S. District Judge Wayne Alley to step aside because he was too affected by the bombing.

> "We're continuing to investigate."
> SGT. BILL MARTIN
> SPOKESMAN FOR THE OKLAHOMA CITY POLICE DEPARTMENT

Some Justice Department officials want Alley removed to deny defense lawyers a possible avenue of appeal, department spokesman Carl Stern said. Ryan has said he supports Alley.

Alley has said he sees no need to recuse himself.

"There's good arguments on both sides," Stern said. Responses to the recusal motions are due today.

Both Stern and Assistant U.S. Attorney Steve Mullins, a spokesman for the prosecution team in Oklahoma City, said Tuesday that the decision had not been made. However, the decision still would be up to Alley himself even if the defense and the prosecution acted together in seeking his recusal.

The federal building was across the street from the federal courthouse, and the bomb damaged Alley's chambers and courthouse. Alley was not at the courthouse when the bomb exploded, but one of his staff was slightly injured.

Meanwhile, the search for the identity of a severed leg found in the rubble of the building continued, law-enforcement officials said.

"We're continuing to investigate," said Sgt. Bill Martin, a spokesman for the Oklahoma City Police Department. The department has given the FBI five missing persons reports that match what authorities have concluded about the leg.

Forensic tests at the FBI's laboratory in Washington concluded that the leg belonged to a black woman between the ages of 16 and 30, contradicting an earlier report issued by the state medical examiner's office that the leg had belonged to a light-skinned male.

FBI spokesman Walt Lamar declined to comment on the progress of the investigation.

Budget plan addressed

■ Universities could gain more control over spending

Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Legislature should be receptive to giving state university officials more control over how money is spent on campuses, two leaders said Tuesday.

House Speaker Tim Shallenburger and Sen. Dave Kerr, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, made their assessments after a hearing on proposals from the Kansas Board of Regents and university officials.

The regents hope legislators give the state's three biggest universities, the University of Kansas, K-State and Wichita State, more control over tuition revenues. A K-State administrator made other suggestions designed to give universities more flexibility over budget matters.

Kerr, R-Hutchinson, said the regents' timing is good because they have raised the issues when legislators are concerned about holding the line on government spending.

"We need to expect these highly paid managers to manage," Kerr said.

Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, said giving university officials more flexibility in budget matters might help them spend less money. For example, he cited one suggestion that universities be allowed to carry money over from budget year to budget year — instead of being required to spend money or see it taken away.

"In a capitalistic society, the way to get anybody to spend less is to take away things that encourage them to spend more," Shallenburger said.

The Legislative Budget Committee reviewed the university proposals. It will make recommendations to the 1996 Legislature. Its members include Kerr and Shallenburger, as well as Rep. Robin Jennison, R-Healy, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

The current budget for the regents system is more than $1.2 billion, or 15 cents of every dollar state government spends.

The state provides $630 million in tax dollars, or 18 cents of every dollar it raises.

Tuition raises another $170 million for regents universities, but the Legislature decides how much the institutions can actually spend.

In years where tuition revenues exceeded expectations, university officials have complained that legislators skimmed the extra money for other government programs. In years it fell short of expectations, legislators have sometimes refused to make up the full difference.

The regents have proposed that the Legislature give up its power to decide how much tuition revenue is spent at KU, K-State and Wichita State. Under their plan, the universities would get to keep unanticipated revenues and would suffer if revenues fell off.

Kerr noted that the regents' proposal called for creating a safety net so that if revenues declined too much, the universities wouldn't suffer as much.

But K-State President Jon Wefald said such a safety net would be used only if student enrollments fell dramatically, such as 5 or 6 percent in a single year.

"I think we're saying to you if enrollment goes down, we lose it," Wefald said. "I don't believe we can have it both ways."

Shallenburger noted that the proposal would help the regents because they are projecting modest growth in student enrollments.

"Every time it's to the advantage of the institutions to change, they come in and suggest it," he said. "You can't blame them for that."

Tom Rawson, K-State's vice president for administration and finance, said other changes could make universities more efficient. For example, he said campuses should have the ability to make purchases of up to $25,000 without going through the Department of Administration. The current limit is $10,000.

Rawson also suggested allowing universities to carry over unspent funds from budget year to budget year.

"Many universities in other states have complete administrative autonomy," Rawson said. "As I talk to my colleagues in other states, they have a lot of freedom."

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Jurors certain with verdict

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — One of the jurors in the O.J. Simpson trial said Tuesday she was certain the panel was right to acquit Simpson of killing his ex-wife and a friend.

"I feel free," said Brenda Moran, released after 266 days of sequestration.

"I think we did the right thing — in fact, I know we did," Moran said, as she arrived at her mother's home in Compton.

Asked why jurors reached the verdict so quickly, Moran said, "We were there for nine months. We didn't need another nine months to decide."

She declined to comment further.

Other jurors left the courtroom where they spent much of the last nine months. They refused to talk to attorneys or reporters eager for clues to how they reached their verdict.

Two bouquets of flowers arrived this morning at the South Central home of Armanda Cooley, the jury forewoman.

"Her only desire right now is to rest and regroup," said Yolanda, her daughter.

Jurors appeared calm as they entered the courtroom Tuesday. One of them, a white woman seated in the front row, smiled happily for the first time in the trial.

Superior Court Judge Lance Ito had set aside time in his courtroom for jurors to hold a news conference, but they decided against speaking with reporters.

For their relatives, the end meant enormous relief.

The sister of juror Gina Rosborough watched the verdict at their mother's home. Moments before her sister's decision was read on national television, Deborah Rhodes said she missed the lives they had together.

"We miss her," Rhodes said. "Usually me and my sisters would go shopping or to the movies or out to lunch. We haven't been able to do that. She's been in there, confined.

"You can only see her when they want you to see her or when she calls," Rhodes said. "She was looking forward to serving her duty, but I don't think she knew it would go this long."

Rhodes said her sister never divulged what she thought of the trial, even though Rhodes prodded.

"I knew I wasn't going anywhere so I stopped asking."

Luther Wilson, the husband of 72-year-old juror Beatrice Wilson, said he was happy it was finally over.

"I'm glad it's over with, but I'm sick of it. I'm just tired," Luther Wilson said. "It's been going on too long. I'm sorry I ever heard about any of this."

George McQuade, public-relations director for the Los Angeles Housing Authority, said Beatrice Wilson had asked for help in protecting her privacy.

"This juror adamantly is opposed to talking to the media," he said.

McQuade said the authorities had blocked media access to the Wilsons' building because it is senior-citizen housing and many of the elderly residents have medical conditions that could be aggravated by disruptions.

Outcome disappoints L.A. police force

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Silence, a numb, sickened silence, fell over the Los Angeles Police Department the moment the O.J. Simpson verdicts were announced.

At the downtown headquarters and on street corners near the court-house, police officers huddled around transistor radios and TV sets brought from home to hear what many hoped would be a conviction.

Maybe that would somehow make up for all the months, indeed all the years, of criticism for ineptitude and racism the department had suffered since the Rodney King beating, the riots and now the Simpson case.

But as the innocent verdicts were read, about 15 officers who moments earlier had been in the auditorium of police headquarters joking, "Where's the champagne?" were rendered speechless. They hung their heads, eyes cast to the ground.

"You can see it in their faces. It's a letdown," Detective Steven Mulldorfer said. "The officers have been hit from Rodney King on — especially uniformed officers. It's just one more thing. It takes a toll on morale after a while."

Some officers were just glad the case was over, at least one agreed with the verdict, and others became indignant and outraged.

"It's a travesty," said Officer Robert Baptista, gathered with a group of uniformed officers in flak jackets on standby for an uprising that didn't come.

"I was sickened," Sgt. Paul Acosta said.

"I'm glad there's not going to be any riot," Sgt. Al Gomez said.

Officer John Porras, a Hispanic man with eight years on the force, said he agreed with the jury.

"Without any witnesses, without concrete evidence, it didn't make any sense. There's a lot of doubt," said Porras, who nonetheless disagreed with the defense argument that the police department bungled the case and framed Simpson.

Police Chief Willie Williams called the verdict a blow to the department.

"We have been pulled a little bit apart," Williams said. "I certainly hope the decision was not based on the defense team putting my department on trial ... that it was not made based on the race card that was played.

"The few bad apples that came out in the trial, such as Mark Fuhrman, are not reflective of the LAPD."

As shocked as many officers were at the verdict, some conceded the department has problems.

"In any endeavor, you wish there were things that could have been done better, but the cost of perfection is prohibitive," Deputy Chief David Gascon said in an interview outside LAPD headquarters. "There are so many false expectations. I wish there was a way for people to see and understand how difficult it is to be a police officer in 1995."

Gilbert Aguilar, an LAPD forensics expert whose crime lab came under attack by the defense, said his department was sorely understaffed and processing crime scenes often turns into a production line.

"We try to do our best, but a lot we just can't do," said Aguilar, who was called by the defense to testify about not finding Simpson's fingerprints at the murder scene.

Aguilar said he believes Simpson is guilty based on the rest of the evidence his department collected and considers the verdict a slap in the face.

"It feels like all the work I've done over all the years, I've done for nothing," he said.

"Why go out to a crime scene anymore and collect evidence when no one's going to listen anyway? I don't feel like working. I want to go home. If I didn't have any bills to pay, I'd quit."

Park sign confusing, tourists complain

Associated Press

ASHEVILLE, N.C. — The words United Nations have been removed from a sign at Mount Mitchell State Park because suspicious tourists thought it meant the United Nations was taking over.

The 1,500 acres of land surrounding Mount Mitchell, the highest peak east of the Mississippi River, was proclaimed a United Nations Biosphere Reserve in 1993.

It was among about 300 natural areas around the world to carry that designation. Managers of these areas agree to share in research and monitoring efforts.

But this summer, the sign was changed to read International Biosphere Reserve because of the negative response, said John Sharpe, superintendent of Mount Mitchell State Park.

"These are people, I got the impression, who may have belonged to militia groups or were interested in militia groups. It was very difficult for me to explain to these people what the designation of a biosphere reserve really was," Sharpe said.

The U.N. has absolutely no control, he said.

The Great Smoky Mountains National Park is also a biosphere reserve, but its sign already reads "international" rather than "U.N." Nevertheless, park officials took a number of phone calls after a speaker on a radio talk show claimed the park had come under U.N. control, Smoky spokeswoman Nancy Gray said.

Some extremist groups claim the existence of a conspiracy to disarm Americans, make U.S. currency worthless and promote a new world order with the U.N. as the sole government.

Such beliefs are based on fear and ignorance of the outside world, said John Fobes of Asheville, who retired as deputy director general of the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

"It seems so outrageous, so impossible. I don't know how to explain it," Fobes said.

▶ SEXUAL DISCRIMINATION

Employee reinstated

Associated Press

DAYTON, Ohio — A former employee of NCR Corp. was awarded more than half a million dollars in a sex-discrimination case, and the company was ordered this week to reinstate her to the job she lost in a 1991 downsizing.

About half of the $535,514 awarded to former senior systems analyst Joyce Taylor, 56, was back pay plus interest. The rest was compensation for pain and suffering.

Taylor's attorney, Mark Byrne, said a former employee testified that at the time Taylor was told she might be discharged, he overheard her immediate supervisor state that his problems were now going to be eliminated because he didn't have women to deal with any longer. Later, Taylor was let go.

Bryne said the company, now AT&T Global Information Solutions, will be responsible for paying his fees.

The company denied discriminating against Taylor. It said her job was eliminated when a product was discontinued.

Day of atonement

story by Jennifer Burdoo

Somber stillness filled the air as people listened quietly to members of the Manhattan Jewish Congregation as they read words of the Bible from the Torah scrolls.

"It's not the services that matter, but the way you feel," said Rami Aizenman, senior in architecture, who participated in the reading.

Yom Kippur, the "Day of Atonement," is the holiest day in the Jewish year.

The Manhattan Jewish Congregation spent Tuesday and Wednesday in the synagogue fasting and praying for forgiveness of their sins.

The 25-hour fast purges the body of sin, and leaves it open to forgiveness from God.

Curator prepares for grand opening

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

If you subscribe to stereotypes, you might think an art curator would dress in wool blazers, have a beard, wear tiny glasses and speak with a New England accent.

Bill North, the new art curator for the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, doesn't fit the stereotype.

North comes across as young but hardly inexperienced.

You almost half-expect he'll be the type of curator to throw keggers at an exhibit opening, but then he'll surprise you when he talks off the cuff about the rich history of printmaking in Kansas.

You could say North's heart belongs to the art and study of printmaking.

North will gladly tell you, with a restrained chuckle, that he graduated with a master's degree in art history from the University of Kansas. He started working on the Beach art museum on August 14.

North doesn't hail from New York City or some other art center, but much closer to home in Overland Park. His family still resides there.

While working on his master's at KU, North worked at the Spencer Museum of Art.

"I had a lot of museum experience at the Spencer Museum," North said.

At the Spencer, North worked in the department of prints and drawings.

"That's my real area of expertise in the history of prints and printmaking — primarily American prints," North said.

Just last year, North was working at the Kresge Art Museum at Michigan State University. He began at the Kresge as a visiting intern, only planning to stay for nine months.

"I stayed on after that working as a curatorial assistant," North said. "Actually, I was working on an exhibition that will open there sometime in 1997."

North became aware of the Beach museum curatorial position by reading a job announcement in a College Art Association journal in December.

North was notified in late spring that the job at the museum was his.

During the interview process, Jessica Reichman, former curator, showed him around the collection and familiarized him with the museum's workings.

North wasn't totally unfamiliar with K-State's art collection, or at least the artists contained within, before accepting the job at the Beach art museum, although he wasn't aware of all the holdings of the collection.

"In the past I've done a lot of research on artists that are in this collection," he said.

"I'm pretty comfortable with much of the material."

Right now, North is busy sorting through files, inventorying items in storage and in his office.

After finishing his current work, North plans to start an inventory of the many art pieces hanging on walls around the campus.

North said there is no formal plan to take works out of campus buildings to move them into the museum. The moving of artwork will be the first priority for the new gallery manager, who has not been hired yet.

Many of the works on campus will go straight to the art museum, North said.

"It's exciting and sort of a relief for everyone that these wonderful works of art will be housed in the proper environment," he said.

North believes the strength of the collection is printmaking because two-thirds of the collection is comprised of prints.

"I would like to see this collection become one of the major centers for study on the subject of prints," North said.

The Friends of Art, a non-profit group which raises funds to donate works to the collection, has been publishing prints as a fund-raiser since its inception.

"The Friends of Art gift prints tradition is one of the oldest print publishing organizations in the country," North said.

"Having that material and tradition here makes sense to take the museum in that direction."

With the addition of North to the Beach art museum, Manhattan just gained one more friend of art.

▶ USER FEES

Student Pub to make cutbacks

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Like many other student services on campus, Student Publications Inc. already has partial user fees.

User fees mean that only the students who use services would have to pay for them. The user-fee proposal is an attempt to reduce the cost of higher education.

The Student Publications fee will be up for review by Student Senate this year, and some members of student government have proposed making the fee more of a user fees.

Both the campus directory and the Royal Purple are funded by partial user fees, Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, said. The Royal Purple and the campus directory are available only to those who pay for them, but they are supported by the $7.80 student fee.

Under a user-fee system, only those students who purchase yearbooks or the directory would pay for their publication costs. The Collegian would have to be subscription-based instead of free.

Johnson said he saw some merits in exploring the idea of user fees.

"It's expensive to go to school," he said. "Student fees are high."

Student Publications is already facing financial problems. The cost of newsprint has increased 50 percent in the last year. Newsprint was 22.25 cents per pound in fall 1994. In fall 1995, newsprint is 40 cents per pound.

In fall 1994, Student Publications spent $89,800 on newsprint. This fall, the projected total is $134,700, even with a reduced press run.

"We are not in the hole," Johnson said. "We're not trying to lose money."

Instead, the Board of Student Publications is looking at ways to make more money to offset the expense. It is also making adjustments in the fiscal year 1996 budget.

"The first thing we're doing is balancing the budget," Ben Clouse, board member, said.

Most of the financial problems stem from the increase in newsprint costs and a slow summer for advertising, Clouse said.

"The budget has been in place since June," he said. "Changes have taken place, and we need to compensate and balance."

Student Publications tries to run just like any other business, Johnson said.

"We're going to be making some cutbacks, and the readers are going to notice," he said.

The Collegian has already decreased the daily press run by 5 percent to combat the rising cost of paper, Johnson said. The press run is now 12,815 copies.

"We've cut back the press run once, and we'll probably be doing it again," Gloria Freeland, associate director of Student Publications, said.

The editors have also worked to make the paper tighter, Clouse said.

The news hole in the paper has already been

Joycelyn Elders to speak tonight

- Joycelyn Elders, former U.S. Surgeon General, will speak at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium.
- "Speaking Your Mind on Controversial Issues" will be free and open to the public.
- Elders, a pediatric endocrinologist, was sworn in as the first African American surgeon general on Sept. 8, 1993. She was the second woman to have this post and directed a 6,000 member corps of doctors, nurses, pharmacists and scientists.
- Elder's term as surgeon general was marked with controversy. Elders did not shy away from sensitive issues, such as AIDS, teenage sexuality or drug use. She said violence, sexually transmitted diseases, poverty and substance abuse were the biggest threats to the health and well-being of American children.
- The lecture is sponsored by the Lou Douglas Lecture Series, Office of Multicultural Affairs, Dorothy Thompson Civil Rights Lectures and Student Governing Association.

▶ NEW YORK LAWYER POSES IN PROVOCATIVE ADS, INCREASES CLIENTELE

GREAT NECK, N.Y. (AP) — This is definitely not something they teach in law school.

Mortgage lawyer Rosalie Osias' firm has gone from five closings a week to 40 or 50 since she began appearing in provocative ads in trade publications in April.

In one ad, the slender Osias, wearing a pantsuit, vest and sunglasses, is lying on her side and toying with a golf club, her long blond hair draped over her shoulders.

The ads reads: "We don't play golf. We're too busy closing your loans."

In another ad, Osias is spread across her desk in a micro-miniskirt, wearing a flirtatious grin. "Try this nonconforming law firm," the ad said.

"I was soliciting a male market," Osias said Tuesday. "Mortgage banking is an old-boy network. I needed something sexual to get them to , notice."

"I can understand how lawyers are trying to be creative and original. But I feel that this type of advertising is in bad taste. It creates a bad image for lawyers who are already getting a bad rap." said Thomas Liotti, the city attorney for Garden City and a former member of the Professional Ethics Committee of the Nassau County Bar Association.

Osias, who is in her 30s, said that before she started running the ads, her business was barely surviving.

By ads No. 3 and 4, male bankers were running to introduce themselves to her.

"Maybe the ads brought in clients, but once they were inside my door, I delivered," she said.

"I gave them exactly what they wanted — good, clean business closings," Osias said.

As for the criticism, she said: "As a lawyer, I had to be very careful not to cross over the line of impropriety. I don't think I've crossed that line."

▶ DUI AFFECTS SENATOR'S CAREER

TOPEKA (AP) — Senate President Bud Burke acknowledged Wednesday his brush with the law for driving while intoxicated probably will be used against him politically.

"I have no doubt it will be used against me in the next campaign," Burke said.

Burke, an Olathe Republican, is one of the state's most powerful legislators and the leader with the longest tenure.

Burke, 61, was stopped by police on the night of Aug. 10, 1994, in Overland Park for driving 66 mph in a 55-mph zone on Interstate 435 near U.S. 69. His blood-alcohol content was 0.108 percent. In Kansas, it is illegal to drive with a blood alcohol content of .08 percent or higher.

"I went to dinner with other legislators and state officials," Burke said. "We talked about state matters. It was a very nice restaurant. I wasn't paying any attention as to how may times they filled my wine glass. Then I got in the car and drove home."

Burke paid $477 to be in a diversion program available to first-time DUI offenders, according to municipal court records.

The charges were dismissed last month after Burke completed the diversion program, which included drug and alcohol education and required that he abstain from alcohol.

Although Burke was not convicted of any offense, the DUI diversion will remain on his record and can be used to enhance any sentence if he is convicted of a similar crime within five years.

"I did a stupid thing," Burke said.

▶ KSU THEATRE

Modern twist enhances old play

Kimberly Kircher
staff reporter

KSU Theatre will present its beefed-up, modern-day version of William Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" on seven production nights beginning tonight.

The play is about two twins, male and female, that get separated in a shipwreck.

It is a hard play to describe, Director Charlotte McFarland said.

"Viola, the twin sister, disguises herself as a man to protect herself, and it ends up that her twin brother is in the same place — the lovely imaginary land of Illyria," she said. "It is a case of mistaken identity."

A variety of scenes and characters make the plot crazier and crazier as the play goes on, McFarland, associate professor of speech, said.

KSU Theatre took a different approach to Shakespeare with "Twelfth Night," giving the original, esoteric humor a modern-day punchline.

Rollerblades, silly string, squirt guns and actors rappelling are some of the ways used to work the audience into the somewhat insane skein of the play.

KSU Theatre has broadly interpreted elements of the play's mechanics, effectively giving the play a modern-day twist while keeping the story itself rooted in Shakespearian tradition, McFarland said.

"We are very faithful to the language and poetry of the script," she said.

"The play is very audience-oriented."

The actors will make an appearance in the lobby before the play begins, talking and mingling with the audience members.

This interaction is part of the effort to move audience members from passive observers to active participants, giving them the ability to shape the course of the play, McFarland said.

"The audience will get to pick who plays minor characters each night," she said.

The production will also feature a variety of music styles, ranging from classical to funk, and costumes from different ages and styles as well.

"The costumes are hard to describe — we designed them in a different manner than we normally do," Dana Pinkston, costume designer, said.

"Usually it takes a six-month design process, 100 hours of sketching and a lot of money," she said

"For 'Twelfth Night,' I made a limit of two week's time and a budget of $100 for 18 costumes," Pinkson said.

The process started by watching rehearsals, Pinkston, assistant professor of speech, said.

"Charlotte and I pulled each actor individually and created a costume for them," she said.

"Our goal was to illustrate a costume without being tied to one period, and that was a creative challenge," Pinkston said.

Another goal was to make the play accessible in our time the way Shakespeare was accessible in his own time," Pinkston said. "Shakespeare was the 'People's Court' of his day."

Gretchen Morgan, senior in theater, plays the character of Olivia, said the actors are excited about the homegrown, no-strings-attached approach to the play.

"We are taking a different approach to Shakespeare by pulling out a lot of comedy in a nontraditional way with the language still being there," Morgan.

"It's like a cartoon approach — with the big, extreme costumes that are great and fun," she said.

If the on-stage antics aren't enough to impress audience members, perhaps K-State President Jon Wefald can help.

Following the opening evening's performance, Wefald will give a reception for the audience, McFarland said.

TWELFTH NIGHT

▶ The KSU Theatre's production of Twelfth Night will run at 8 p.m. October 5-7 and October 11-14 in Nichols Theatre.

▶ TECHNICAL COLLEGE

School board approves MATC college proposal

Robert Patnode
staff reporter

The Manhattan Area Technical Center took one step closer to being recognized as a college Wednesday night.

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education voted unanimously in favor of a joint agreement with K-State that would make the center a technical college.

The agreement would allow the center to offer associate of applied science degrees.

Technical center students would take required and elective courses toward their degree at K-State. Other technical courses would be offered at the center.

Cloud County Community College offers some general education classes at the center.

Students would be able to transfer their CCCC hours to K-State if the agreement is approved by the Kansas State Board of Education, Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas Legislature.

Bill Berry, the technical center director, said he is cautiously optimistic about the plan.

"We still have a couple of steps to go," Berry said.

"Pending those approvals, then I think we're going to continue to do what we've been doing, and that is to provide people with their technical skills."

Berry said the plan will allow the center to work in conjunction with K-State in offering general education classes, which will be transferable.

He said some of the general education classes would be in math, social sciences and English.

Duane Dunn, assistant director of the center, said the ideal time of the application to reach the Kansas State Board of Education and the regents for approval is November.

He said the center would like to see the conversion begin at the beginning of the 1996 fiscal year, July 1.

Dunn said the center received an overwhelming favorable student response to the conversion in surveys.

Sue Reeves, coordinator of the center's computer center, said the transferability will benefit the students.

"Students can earn credit hours that might transfer to Kansas State University," Reeves said. "They have a much greater employability opportunity with an associate applied science degree.

"That's our mission statement — try to put people in the work place."

Berry said the plan would allow students to earn a degree from the center instead of having to transfer to a community college to earn an associate's degree.

"One reason why we should be a technical college is we offer that much of it anyway," he said.

The Emporia and Wichita technical colleges are the only technical schools in the state that have transferability status.

Berry said he thinks the only obstacle for the plan will be the Legislature.

"I'm confident," Berry said.

"My biggest concern is the Legislature because it's hard to predict how that body will respond," he said.

"But I think with our Sen. Lana Oleen carrying the ball for us, we've got as good of a chance as anybody," Berry said.

Berry said if it passes through the Legislature and Gov. Bill Graves signs the bill, the center students will pay the same tuition and fees other K-State students pay.

in our opinion

Large donations buy right to show disrespect

It's not that we're ungrateful for the Hale's donation. It's just that selling a building's name to the highest bidder makes it less of a memorial and more of a sales incentive.

Farrell Library is no more. Along with complete physical reconstruction, the library is getting a shiny, new image.

Hale Library will take its place.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, justified the name change as a show of gratitude to the $2-million donors, Joe and Joyce Hale of Kansas City, who also encouraged others to donate additional money.

The bad connotation that the name Farrell gives is another cause for the change, according to Hobrock.

So much for tradition. So much for respect for the deceased. So much for asking for anybody's opinion. Hail, Hale.

Renaming a building originally named for someone else is disrespectful. David Farrell, University president from 1925-1943, will probably roll over in his grave.

K-State alumni will probably say, "Hale what?"

It's not that we're ungrateful for the Hale's donation. It's just that selling a building's name to the highest bidder makes it less of a memorial and more of a sales incentive.

If giving enormous amounts of money to physical objects justifies the right to name it, the Collegian Editorial Board would like to officially re-name a few places at K-State:

■ The Student Publications Inc. Coke Machine (formerly known as the Coke machine outside of Kedzie 116).

■ The K-State Collegian Parking Meter (all K-State Student Union parking meters apply).

And finally, let's rename Hale Library for all the K-State students, who donated $5 million altogether and were left out of selecting a new name: U Name It, We'll Buy It.

▶ UPC SHORT-SIGHTED

Editor,

This letter is regarding Scott Allen Miller's review of the Soul Asylum/Matthew Sweet in Tuesday's Collegian.

I sincerely doubt the low turnout at Bramlage Coliseum had anything to do with the proposed size of anyone's belt buckle.

The answer lies within the question on this one. Look how many times the words MTV and high school were used in the article, I don't think the average student on campus would have felt comfortable in such an environment.

Besides, who wants to spend their hard-earned cash and/or government aid on tickets to some MTV-generated, mass-produced, easy-listening rock band?

The K-State campus is diversified enough to attract a decently sized audience to a good show. A look beyond channel 29 by the Union Program Council would prove this to be true.

▶ POOR REVIEW

Editor,

Scott Allen Miller's review of the Matthew Sweet/ Soul Asylum concert was very poor. The review never really stated the most important fact of Monday night's event: Whoever was not at the concert missed an incredible show.

I'll be the first to agree that there was an attendance problem, but that's nothing new. The review printed by the Collegian certainly did nothing to improve that. Miller repeatedly poked fun at the younger crowd. Sure they moshed to some slower songs, but that's probably because Manhattan rarely gets big-name, quality bands and they wanted to make the most of it.

If Miller wasn't so busy trying to criticize our fellow concert-goers, he might have had time to write about how much fun the concert really was.

He maybe could have mentioned that the curtained-off area in Bramlage provided a very personal setting to the show.

He could have mentioned that as far as opening acts go, it doesn't get much better than the great set played by Matthew Sweet. How about the fact Soul Asylum's variety of songs combined with some nice lighting effects makes them great live performers?

I would like to thank the Manhattan High students for coming Monday night. Union Program Council tries hard to get quality bands, and I encourage everyone not to miss the next show, and feel free to mosh, even if Scott Allen Miller doesn't think it's OK.

For limb retention and maximum damage,

baseball bats epitomize home defense

With the trial of the century behind us, maybe we can now begin to bring back some semblance of normalcy to our everyday lives.

Based on the jury's assessment, I know I am going to rest much easier knowing that O.J. Simpson AND whoever killed Nicole Brown and Ron Goldman are freely walking the streets of America.

Let's take a quick poll: Does anyone believe the Simpson jury actually deliberated on anything of consequence during its 3-1/2-hour coffee break?

My guess is they were taking final bets on whether Judge Ito actually had clothes on underneath his black robe — a crucial speculation the defense team failed to enter as testimony, by the way.

Crime is a popular topic with many Americans these days. The consensus seems to be that we should take all criminals, lock each one up in a cell roughly the size of a box of Cheerios and throw away the key. In reality, what we have are thousands of criminals being locked up in the penal equivalent of a Holiday Inn.

"A weight room, movies, television, a library, free food and laundry service," — this is from a vacation brochure describing Lansing Correctional Facility at Leavenworth. Who in their right mind wouldn't want to spend an extended holiday in a place like that?

"Whatever happened," many Americans ask, "to the idea where, if you are sent to prison, you go there to make little rocks out of big rocks?"

I don't have answers to many of these questions. All I know is some young person, in full view of my surveillance cameras managed to negotiate the minefield in my front yard and smash my mailbox into its fundamental, Periodic Table-type molecules.

I' m sorry, I shouldn't assume it was a "young person." From the destruction, one could quite logically conclude "Mongolian Hordes," or quite possibly a "Romulan Bird of Prey" — whichever produces the largest debris field.

If one follows the Simpson defense team's logic, the person or persons who destroyed my mailbox were probably Colombian drug dealers out to get Faye Resnick, or possibly (and I shudder at the mere thought) a plot by the Los Angeles Police Department.

Mailbox Baseball is actually a popular game wherein people with zits and braces who have recently acquired the privilege to drive and who have also recently acquired a 2,000-pound Vehicle Of Terror And Destruction, then load this vehicle with numerous, zit-faced co-conspirators (also called dudes), and proceed to drive down residential streets late at night at speeds approaching Extreme Maximum Totally Warped Light Speed and smash mailboxes with highly complex, rapid-fire weapons that closely resemble M-16 baseball bats.

This is all quite an innocent, youthful, blowing-off-steam-type of activity in my opinion, and hardly the serious type of crime many Americans worry about (unless of course I catch the little dweebs, and then it will be a case of mass murder, but I will then hire Johnny Cockroach as my lawyer and be completely exonerated).

What many of us worry about are the breaking-and-entering/burglary/mugging/sexual assault/assault-with-a-deadly-weapon/drive-by-shooting/murder/serial-killer/O.J.-type crimes. Many people feel that keeping a loaded gun in your home or on your person is the best way to protect yourself from these crimes.

In fact, the Texas Legislature recently approved a law whereby the average citizen can carry a concealed weapon. I am not sure I would want to live in a state with such a law, where half the population holds up their pants using a belt with the name Bubba stamped on it.

I have considered keeping a gun in the house, but I just can't picture a criminal-type situation (O.J., maybe you can help me with this) in which I would logically use it.

(Loud, crashing noise late at night)

My wife: "Brad, get the gun! Someone is breaking into the house!"

Me: "ME get the gun? WHY ME?"

My wife: "Because you're a man."

Me: "I NEVER said that!"

Criminal (with gun): "Excuse me. While you two are arguing the finer points of equality among the sexes, could you please hand over any cash and expensive jewelry you might have in your possession?"

The obvious critical factor in situations like this is (in case, because some hereditary genetic factor like STUPIDITY, you haven't figured this one out yet) the burglar ALREADY HAS A LOADED GUN.

I, on the other hand, am going to have to wake up out of a complete, brain-dead coma, nervously find my gun (while arguing with my wife), pull back the hammer and pull the trigger, all within a matter of a few guano-seconds, and do so WITHOUT BLOWING OFF BOTH MY FEET.

Even Clint Eastwood in his best Dirty Harry movie wouldn't attempt it.

This is why I have decided that the safest thing to do is to keep a baseball bat by my bed. I have seen first-hand the damage Colombian drug dealers do with baseball bats.

(Loud, crashing noise late at night)

My Wife: "Brad, get the baseball bat! Someone is breaking into the house!"

Me: "Don't worry dear, it's just Colombian drug dealers looking for Faye Resnick. They'll be finished in a few minutes."

Individuals choose to be motivated to learn

During the past few weeks, the debate concerning student financial aid has heated up as Congress has tried to balance the budget.

Congress has reviewed student aid to try to find ways to reduce the costs of the program, up to and including some actual reductions in the amount spent on the program.

Recently, Sen. Nancy Kassebaum proposed a bill that would require universities to remit a small portion of the amount they received in federal student aid (the most recent figure is less than 1 percent).

Although this might save costs, it simply stoked the fire of those in favor of government aid and those against.

JEREMY STEPHENS

It even happened here at K-State. Last year, Student Body President Jeff Peterson sent letters en masse outlining his plan to "Access the Future."

He wrote that this could be done by fighting record-breaking tuition increases of the last 10 years, maintaining open admissions to our state universities and working together to make a difference. The last item is a good philosophy, and I hope we can all work together.

The first two are a different story.

The recommendation given to fight tuition increases is to contact elected representatives and ask them to try to legislate it away. The problem is there are some things that can't be legislated away, such as inflation.

Before I continue, let me say I do want as many people to receive as much education as they need to achieve their dreams, but their dreams should be an incentive to do well in school and to avoid depending on the state to get them through school.

Although state-funded education has a noble motive, it does not always live up to the expectations of those who designed the system for one reason — people are people.

Not everyone who is given a college education has the desire to complete it.

It also causes two additional problems. First, students learn to become dependent on the state. Secondly, and even worse, it reduces the willingness to accept risk.

If we pad society to the extent that no one fails, we have performed a great disservice for future generations.

The emphasis shifts from "What can one do?" to "What does one deserve?"

Anyone that spends much time with children knows that if they are given everything they want, they will become spoiled and never learn to accept risk well.

In the debate concerning student aid, those who are in favor of it have rarely stopped to think about whether government should be providing it in the first place.

It is time to question whether government should be so involved in education, regardless of how long it has been. It's not working.

When we are forced to re-scale for Scholastic Aptitude Test exams because of poor scores and watch as foreign countries pass us by, it is time to re-examine how we educate ourselves.

The second point, maintaining an open-admissions policy, also contributes to the problem of escalating costs by those who do not finish a degree but were subsidized by the state in the meantime.

The notion that a person deserves entry into college simply because they live in Kansas and possess a pulse is a pitfall for achievement.

According to the letter, there is a proposal circulating among the higher echelons of state government that would require students to either maintain a 2.0 grade point average in high school, receive a 23 or better on the American Collegiate Testing Program exam or graduate in the top third of their class to gain entry to a state university.

Although this has not yet been implemented or approved by anyone that would make it binding, it is not a bad idea.

These requirements are not overbearing. In fact, they provide high-school students with a goal and an incentive to achieve their best in school.

Yes, there are students with learning disabilities and other circumstances beyond their control, but the vast majority of students do not have disabilities.

This is not mean-spirited. It is not exclusionary, either, because those that do not excel on the ACT can indicate their success during four years in their GPA or class rank.

Peterson concludes that we deserve an education. No one deserves a higher education any more that we all deserve three-car garages, a starting position with the Cleveland Indians and free trips to Europe.

No matter how much these things would improve life, they all must be earned.

College education is not a right; it is a privilege.

Learning is a choice made by the individual regardless of the education thrust in front of him. Education does not guarantee learning or a brighter future without motivation on the part of the individual, no matter what the state thinks is best for them or how it chooses to subsidize that choice.

There is a difference between what is earned and what is deserved. It is not just or right to take money from one group and give it to another, no matter what the cause, simply because it seems like a good thing to do.

It is time to realize that the individual motivates the individual, not the things the individual is given.

MOVIE MAKING 101

LAND OF OZ IS NO LONGER LAND OF BLAHS IN MOVIE INDUSTRY ■ BY SARAH KALLENBACH

The world of movies is coming to Kansas.

The movie industry, which was once confined to California, is spreading out to include the Midwest.

"Los Angeles is the center of the business, but now Austin, Texas, has grown into a movie-making city, and so has Florida," said Joe Anderson, associate professor of film and theater at the University of Kansas. "It is now possible to find the industry all over."

When the real movies come to the state, students have the opportunity to get real experience. The recent film "Truman" was one example of students helping out.

"Whenever the movies come to Kansas, we often have 15 students working on the set," Joe Anderson said.

The students are employed in almost every aspect of the production of the movie from costumes to acting.

"Obviously, the students have small, entry-level parts, but they get to work in all of the fields," Joe Anderson said.

Working in all the fields allowed students to get experience locally in the acting.

Cathy Anderson, associate professor of speech at K-State, said when actors work for the camera, they must be consistent through each shot.

"When working for the camera, you are working for marks. The camera cannot always adjust for inches at that moment," Cathy Anderson said. "Whatever specific props you touch you have to make sure you are doing it exactly the same every time."

For actors working in films, self-motivation is something that must be present.

"Film work is independent. They might just have a camera runthrough once before the real thing," Cathy Anderson said.

Run-throughs work in movies because they can be reshot.

"One reason you can do that is that you want spontaneity, and based on your budget, you can do it over and over again," Cathy Anderson said.

Making sure they get the right shot is the job of the director, who has to have certain characteristics.

"Having a diverse background helps directors," Cathy Anderson said. "They can bring different ways of seeing things into the theater."

Some of the characteristics cannot be taught.

"The basic competencies are necessary. You can teach people vision better, but you can't instill brilliance or insight into someone," Cathy Anderson said.

Because of the criticism from others, a director has to love what they do.

"Their work is continually being judged. It is a very public kind of activity," Cathy Anderson said.

The director's job is important because of the effect the shot can have on the scene of the movie.

"When thinking about shots for film, you are literally moving the eyes of the audience, and you want them to feel emotions," Cathy Anderson said.

On the campus of KU, students are making movies.

"Students start small but move up to feature-length films," Joe Anderson said.

The students are responsible for every part of the process from the beginning to the end.

"They write their own scripts and have to finance their own projects. Provide their own transportation wherever they may go and pay for their own lunch," Joe Anderson said.

The University provides the lighting, camera equipment and sometimes the film.

"Students struggle with the process because they are learning as they go," Joe Anderson said. "The most difficult thing for anyone in the movie business is to come up with a good idea."

At K-State, the Broadcasting Educational Communicational Center works to help promote the university and other private groups through videos.

The BECC has made tapes for halftime spots at sporting events, promotions for the speech department and the College of Education and other off-campus businesses.

"Some projects have been on campus and some off campus. We have been to Kansas City and all around the state," Jim Mock, senior producer and director of BECC, said.

Mock said the tapes were done mostly by professional staff, but some students get involved.

Brett Hightower, production assistant and studio supervisor, said that making the tapes was a very expensive production.

"We use all kinds of equipment. We have a couple of studios with large cameras that are used in making news broadcast and then we have field cameras that we use on location," Hightower said. "All in all the cameras cost $50,000-$60,000."

The process of making the tapes involves many steps from pre-production decisions that include script writing and voice selections to editing the tape to get the right shot.

On a large project, 10-11 people could work on a film.

Whether students are interested in educational films or the big screen, the business is huge.

"The motion-picture field is the second-largest export business. It is a giant industry, and it is one that the United States is the leader world-wide," Joe Anderson said.

Even with all the opportunities, making it big in the industry can be difficult.

"No one is going to be here to interview you. You have to go and seek a position. You have to take the initiative," Joe Anderson said.

MAKE A MOVIE ON YOUR COMPUTER

Though computers were once primitive machines, now even amateurs can make movies using personal computers. The process for film-making via computer is basically the same as traditional film making, but the end result can be played on a Macintosh or Windows PC.

Here are some of the basics for making your own movie:

Script Writing

The story you choose to communicate to your audience is the most important part of the movie. If you don't have an exciting story, then you don't have a movie that people will want to see.

Once you have written the script, you must use desktop publishing programs to format the script. Though formatting the script seems unimportant, it is far more important than you might think.

There is a rule in Hollywood not to hire anyone who does not know what they are doing. Therefore, if you plan on marketing your script in Hollywood, and your script does not look professional, it will not be accepted.

The rules for formatting the script are described in "The Complete Guide to Standard Script Formats" by Cole/Haag (CMC Publishing, $16.95). You can also do a search on the World Wide Web under screenplay formatting.

Keep in mind when writing your script, that each page of script equals about one minute of play on the screen. A feature-length movie script needs to be between 90 and 100 pages.

And when making movies with the program QuickTime, you should limit the script to four pages or less, due to the huge amount of disk space required.

Storyboard

The next thing you need is a storyboard. A storyboard is a set of drawings used to map out the movie so that the directors can follow it.

To make your storyboard, create a document with one frame on each page. Type one sentence under each frame.

Remember that each shot on film averages 5 seconds in length, ranging from 3 to 7 seconds. If the dialogue is longer than 5 seconds, break it up into two or more shots.

When you create the storyboard, consider the mood of the scene. This will determine what lens you should use. Both wide-angle and telephoto lenses distort the image. A normal lens does not.

A wide-angle lens makes the scene seem distant and unfriendly. A telephoto lens makes the scene look warm and soft. A normal lens makes the scene look plain, dull and boring.

Indicate how much of the background should be seen. If everything in the scene must be in sharp focus, then you need to have greater depth of field. That can be obtained by using a wider-angled lens or by decreasing the size of the iris of the lens (which makes the lens act like a pinhole camera). The iris can be made smaller only if you switch to faster film or add more light.

Also make notes on the storyboard if the camera is looking up or down on the subject. If the camera looks up, the figure will look more powerful and threatening. If the camera looks down, the figure will look weak and insignificant.

If the camera moves in the scene, indicate the move by drawing two frames. The first indicates where the camera starts and the other indicates what the camera sees when the movement is finished. Then draw an arrow between the two frames to indicate they are part of the same shot.

The camera is moved for three reasons:

1. To give the scene a sense of depth. If the camera moves to the side even slightly, it gives the scene a sense of depth. The rate of movement of all the objects in the scene shows the relative distance between all the objects in the scene.

2. To follow the action. Caution: Too much motion can cause seasickness.

3. To create a transition between one action and another. This is called an "in-camera edit" and can be very graceful.

Never zoom the camera lens in or out if you can help it. Always move the camera itself in or out. A zoom only magnifies an already flat image while moving the camera in magnifies the scene while adding 3-D depth to the scene.

Remember the Golden Rule of motion pictures: "If it doesn't move, don't film it!" That means if the actors do not move in a scene, move the camera instead.

Video vs. Film

Film is better than video for making an independent motion picture. There are a number of reasons for this:

■ Film has a wider range of contrast. Negative photographic film can record 9 to 12 f-stops of light. Video and slide film can record only 4 to 6 f-stops. An f-stop determines the amount of light allowed to be exposed to the film. By shooting at a lower f-stop, you are letting more light into the camera.

The lighting of a scene is usually much more difficult and expensive for video than for film since shadows need fill lighting when using video.

■ Film can be shot and projected at any speed. Video can only be recorded and played at only one speed. Slow motion is easier and better with film.

You should borrow or rent a camcorder since filming is only a small part of making the movie. Video cameras go out of date far too quickly considering the expense of the camera.

Offense comes together in time for Big 8 play

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

When practice started in mid-August, new offensive coordinator Dana Dimel had his hands full. After all, he had to find replacements for standouts Chad May and J.J. Smith at the skill positions, and Barrett Brooks and Jim Hmielewski on the offensive line.

Quarterback Matt Miller has proven he can run the offense with precision. He's starting to throw the ball better and has picked up 175 yards on the ground.

Through the first month, Miller has completed 66 percent of his passes, 60-for-91, for 745 yards and 10 touchdowns.

Against Northern Illinois last week, Miller went 19-for-27 with 230 yards and three scores to enter the Missouri game on a wave of momentum.

"It was probably the best game I've played this year, and that's the way it's supposed to be," Miller said.

"You're supposed to get better each week, and I feel I'm improving as a quarterback. There's a lot of things I can still get better at. I've just got keep working on them in practice."

Furthermore, the coaches have said they aren't afraid of injury when Miller scrambles.

"He does a nice job with it, and he's getting durable with the experience," Dimel said. "He's seeing things well, and what I like about it is that it keeps the defense in their rush lanes."

Even though Miller has taken some heavy shots this season, he said he won't stop running.

"That's part of my game," he said. "I got some quickness so they've never told me not to try to make a play. That's part of my arsenal so I try to use it."

Miller's transition to the starting position has been bolstered by the wide-receiving trio of Kevin Lockett, Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger.

Lockett already has seven touchdown receptions and 21 catches; Running has 20 catches and three scores with Schwieger hauling in 19 passes and one touchdown. Lockett and Running are ranked Nos. 1 and 2 in the Big 8 for catches per game.

Lockett was in man coverage last Saturday and came away with a career-high nine catches.

"Kevin's such a special player that whenever someone tries to cover him one-on-one, we want to isolate him and get him the ball," Dimel said.

In the last two games, K-State also has started to work-in junior Jimmy Dean, who has five catches on the season but also a handful of drops.

> "We want to see a consistent four quarters of play, and we haven't seen that yet offensively. The best we got was against Temple."
> DANA DIMEL
> K-STATE OFFENSIVE COORDINATOR

"He had a good week of practice last week, and it's good because we've been razzing him and giving him a lot of trouble about dropping the ball, so now he's more conscientious about it," Dimel said.

To replace Smith, Dimel has used Mike Lawrence and Eric Hickson, two sophomores who came into the season with little experience. So far, they are the team's top two runners, Lawrence with 337 yards and two touchdowns, Hickson with 327 and three scores.

"Each game, they're getting a little better, and they both bring something different to the table," Dimel said.

As evidenced by a first quarter fourth-and-two play against Northern Illinois, Lawrence can take the available hole instead of running over somebody. Hickson, on the other hand, is more of a power back.

"Mike's a picker and a slasher, and Hick's more of a downhill-burst type of guy," Dimel said.

With K-State using the two-back offense most of the time, fullback Dederick Kelly has been a force as a blocker.

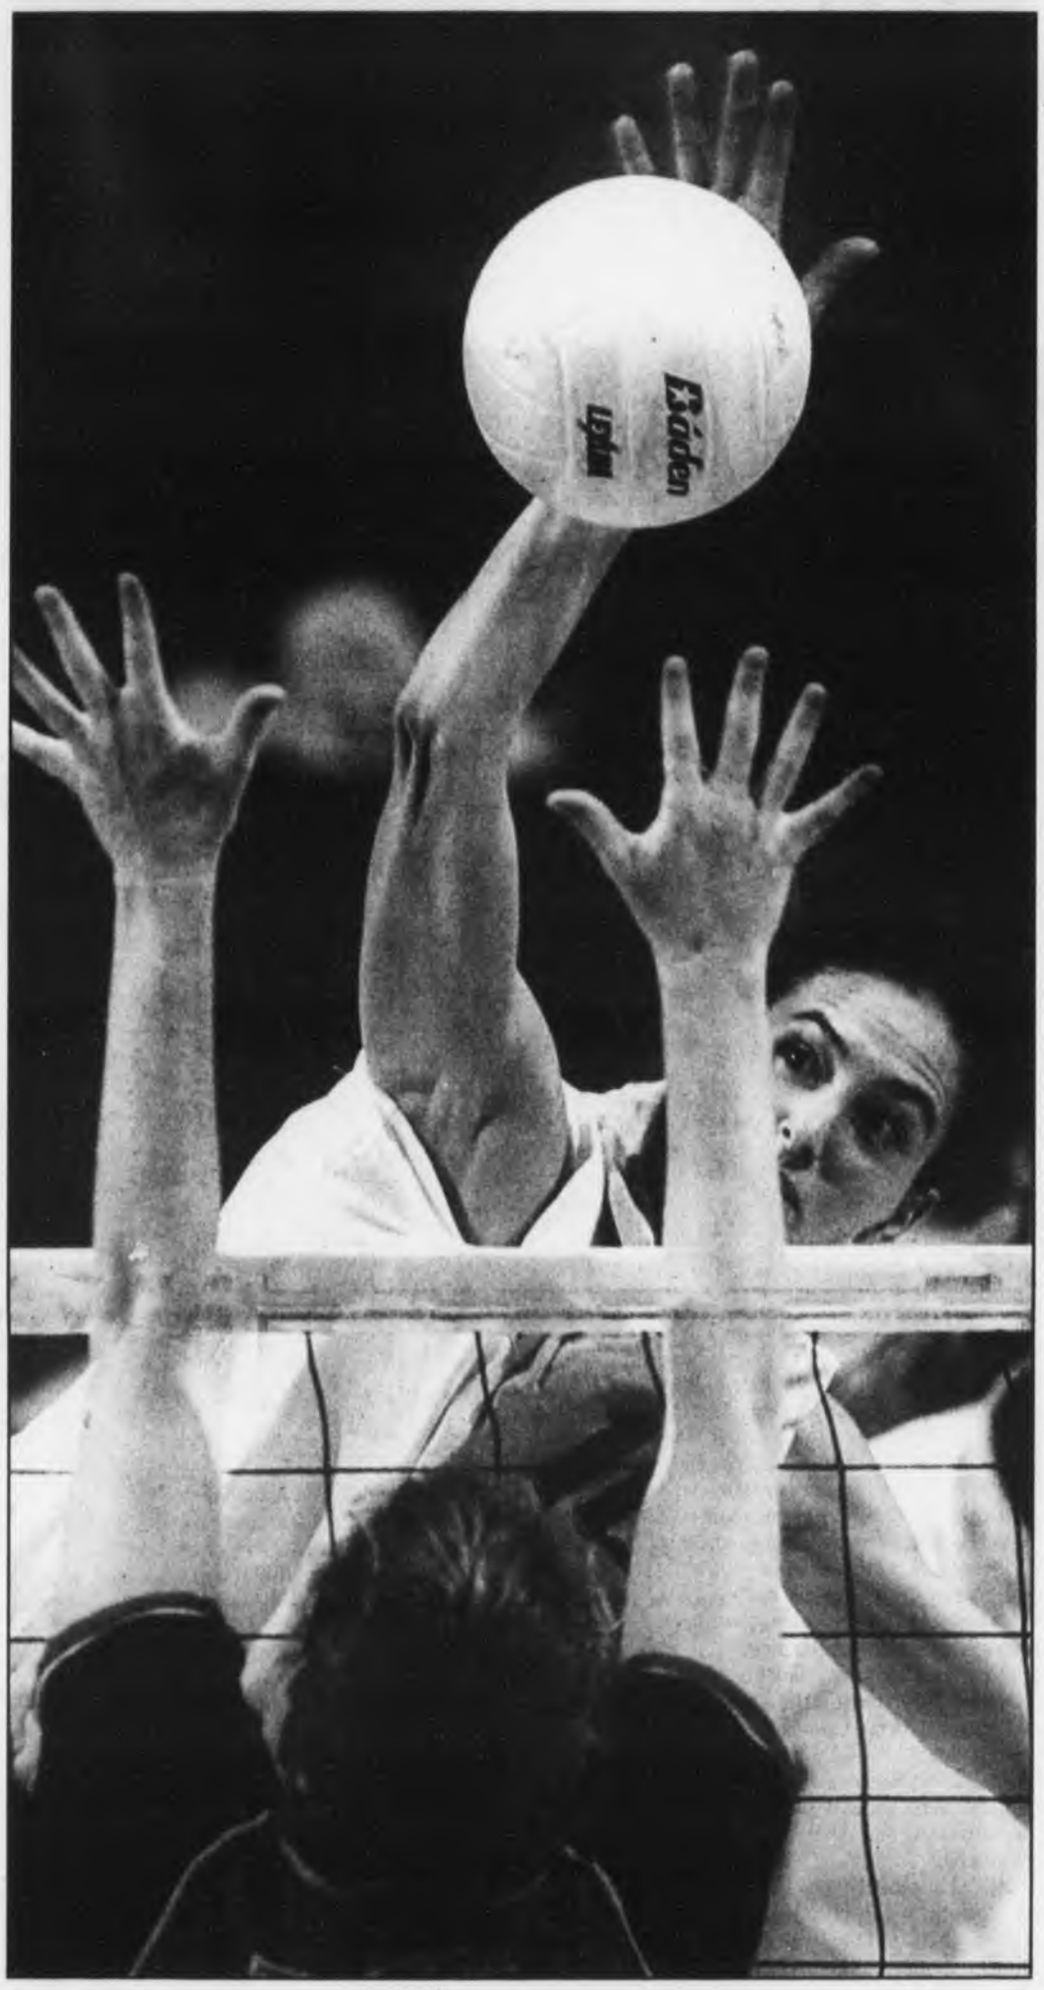
"Them doing so well makes me look good because if they weren't making any yardage, then I'd pretty much not be playing," Kelly said.

The offensive line is opening holes for the runners and giving Miller, on most occasions, plenty of time to set and throw. But Dimel said the penalties need to be eliminated.

"We've had some penalties, and we need to improve on that," Dimel said. "We're playing good, though."

The offense as a whole, Dimel said, hasn't put a full four quarters of good play together yet.

Against Cincinnati and Northern Illinois, the second halves were good, but against Akron, the competition just wasn't there, Dimel said.



"We want to see a consistent four quarters of play, and we haven't seen that yet offensively," Dimel said.

"The best we got was against Temple."

Miller said the offense has made strides but still can keep improving.

"We need to get better," he said. "I think we've done a good job, but we can get better so we just got to keep striving."

Cyclones outlast Cats in 5-game match

The K-State Volleyball team dropped an important match last night to Iowa State.

Coach Jim Moore said, "I just kept telling them, it's not going to be that easy. And it wasn't."

The Wildcats allowed the Cyclones to come back from a 2-0 game deficit and win the match 3-2.

The Cats won the first two games of the match 15-5 and 15-9 then went to the locker room confident that they would win the third game easily.

"They felt good, they knew that they could come out and beat them," Coach Jim Moore said.

But the game didn't happen quite the way the Cats expected.

Instead, Iowa State dominated the third game, stifling the K-State offense and winning 5-15.

"We expected it to be easy, and it wasn't. They started digging balls at the end of the second game," Moore said.

"We even said it downstairs, the kids even said that they were digging balls at the end of the second game."

"They just absolutely gave us games one and two. We didn't come out ready, expecting to fight. We expected them to just roll over and die and they didn't," he said.

Iowa State got itself back into rhythm, he said. "They started to dig a lot of balls, and we weren't willing to work for it."

K-State was able to rebound for the fourth game but failed to capitalize on a 14-10 lead. The team allowed the Cyclones to regroup and defend, and then attack, defeating the Cats 16-14.

"We felt like the other team was going to just roll over for us and give us the game but we didn't push through to the end of the point," junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk said.

"We got to 14, and we thought they were just going to give us that last point. We had opportunities to win that fourth game. I just think we didn't play hard enough."

Moore said the Cats had an opportunity to win the match if they had not been manhandled by the Cyclones in the third game.

"If we would have come out and played in game three like we did in game four, we might have been able to gain some momentum back," he said.

"But you semi-panic when you go up two games to none and they come back. You panic a little bit."

Moore does not have much to say about the Cats' upcoming match at Oklahoma Saturday night.

"Play the whole match, that might help," he said.

DeClerk hopes that the team redirects its anger from tonight's loss and uses it to win against the Sooners this weekend.

"Either people are going to react that they're going to go out and they're going to win, or people are just going to let it go," DeClerk said. "Hopefully, everyone is going to take it, go with it and next time don't go down when it gets that close."

The Cats lost the fifth game 15-12.

Not one Wildcat dominated the game last night. Senior hitter Jill Dugan managed 11 kills offensively and had a team high 24 digs defensively. She also contributed five block assists.

Junior play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young had 11 kills and two of the Cats' seven service aces, but she also had eight errors.

Sophomore setter Devon Ryning had 61 set assists and 13 digs for the team and also had one of the team's service aces.

DeClerk led the team with a .306 hitting percentage, including 14 kills. She also led with seven block assists.

Freshman hitter Kim Zschau hit .228 with 21 kills and eight errors.

Rules change for annual ticket campout

Chris May
staff reporter

The flag is up.

That was the cry of many K-State basketball fans as the flag was raised outside of Ahearn Field House, kicking off a campout for students to purchase tickets for the basketball season.

There's a new system now. Among the changes made, students now know the flag is going up at 7 a.m. Wednesday.

Students will need to go between 7 and 9 a.m. Wednesday at Ahearn for registration, said Jason Wollum, senior in architectural engineering and chairman of athletic ticket sales committee.

They will be asked to turn in a registration slip, which is available at the Student Governing Association office in the Union. On that sheet of paper, students must put their name, student ID number and whether they have already paid for their tickets already. This needs to be done for each member of their campout group. Students can have up to 100 campers in a group.

"For every 20 members in the group, you must have a representative there at all times. So if you have 80 people in your group, you must have four people in your tent at all times and at the random roll-calls," Wollum said.

Once at registration, campers have one hour to get some form of a tent set up, said Marcia Hellwig, senior in accounting and assistant chairman of athletic ticket sales committee.

Another change in the campout is that nobody will know what their place is in line until Friday, when a lottery will be held, Wollum said.

"The lottery is done by campout groups, which are determined on the first day of campout," Wollum said.

The lottery starts at 8 a.m. with the I Contributed A Twenty, or ICAT, students buying their tickets first.

Those ICAT students who do not camp out are next in line to buy tickets, Wollum said.

Once the ICAT students have purchased their tickets, there will be a break for lunch, and then the general-admission tickets, along with reserved tickets, will go on sale, Wollum said.

There are only 450 non-reserved tickets for students, Carol Adolph, athletic ticket manager, said.

The lottery could mean everything for students who want general-admission tickets, so students should follow the rules if they want a shot at tickets. One thing campers must do before campout is clean up their mess.

"You must have your campout area clean before buying your tickets," Hellwig said.

Students who arrive at the campout after 9 a.m. will be put on the end of the list but will not be a part of the lottery, Hellwig said. You will be put on the list of non-lottery campers.

Another change this year is that campout is being held earlier.

"We are holding the campout earlier this year so hopefully it will be warmer. There's also an away football game that weekend so maybe the students won't be so busy," Hellwig said.

Because campout is so early, the men's basketball team will not get a chance to scrimmage in front of the campers. The team will show their stuff at 12:01 a.m. October 15 at Bramlage Coliseum for Midnight Madness.

Campers will get a glimpse of Coach Tom Asbury and the team during campout as they bring inspirational messages and food for campers.

"I think this is a great tradition that K-State has," Asbury said. "This is a great way to generate interest for basketball."

Players are encouraged to participate in the campout because it promotes energy and enthusiasm for the team, Asbury said. He is trying to get as many players involved in campout as possible.

Despite the changes, several last year's rules are being enforced this year.

Alcohol is not allowed at campout. If a group is caught with alcohol, they are forced out of the lottery drawing but are allowed to come back and purchase tickets after the campers, Wollum said.

Many events are scheduled throughout campout. On the first day there is a mandatory informational meeting at 5 p.m. in the Union Little Theater. A representative must be there from each group, with an additional representative for every 20 members of the group.

The K-State volleyball team will host Nebraska at 7:30 p.m. in Ahearn Wednesday.

On Thursday morning, the women's basketball team with arrive with donuts, and in the evening there will be a showing of "Ferris Bueller's Day Off," which will be projected on the side of the Union, Wollum said.

Friday is the big day. Coach Asbury and the team will be on hand distributing donuts and the ICAT lottery will begin.

This year's campout is only funded by the Athletic Department, Wollum said. The cost to run campout is around $2,000. That includes security for the campsite, which means paying the security guards overtime. There is also a cost for maintenance and food that is provided, Wollum said.

Wollum, the basketball team and the athletic department are hoping that the changes for campout this year will make it better than ever.

"We want campout to stay the same year in and year out and we're also trying to make it fair to everyone," Wollum said.

The committee is trying to incorporate groups of all sizes.

"It always used to be that when students waited for the flag to go up, it was the people that had a large group that were there. The small groups couldn't afford to always have someone standing out there waiting," Wollum said.

Asbury had never heard of anything like this before he came to K-State, not even at UCLA, but said he was glad K-State has it.

Before the football team was successful, the basketball campout was the highlight of the fall season.

Now that the football team is winning, Asbury said he hopes students will get back into the campout spirit.

If students have any questions about campout, they are encouraged to call Jason Wollum at 587-9763 or Marcia Hellwig at 395-2178.

Students get tips for living

■ Speaker provides keys to happiness in college, life

Jennifer Taylor
staff reporter

One too many drinks led to the death of a University of Iowa Lambda Chi Alpha new member early this fall. His sobering death occurred when he asphyxiated on his own vomit.

"You will never know what it feels like to see a body bag being taken out of a chapter house with 40 other men crying," said Mary Peterson, associate director of programs at the University of Iowa, at a Greek Affairs-sponsored lecture Tuesday.

Older members had put the student to bed around 11 p.m. and monitored him until early morning. But sometime between 4 a.m. and 6 a.m., the new member died.

"You can die from alcohol without being bombed. All you have to do is choke on your own regurgitation," she said.

Whether students drink is a personal choice, but everyone can make responsible choices, Peterson said.

"The greatest power in life is to make your own decisions. You can make your final call," Peterson said.

One drink takes an hour to filter through the body's system, and only time will sober a person up, she said.

"You all have heard the myths of getting someone sober, but a shower just makes a wet drunk, and coffee makes a wide-awake drunk. And nobody wants to be around a wide-awake drunk," Peterson told the group.

The best thing a student can do for a friend who has been drinking is put him to bed on his side and monitor him through the night, Peterson said.

Stress and being unhappy are not reasons to get drunk, Peterson said.

"All the stress you encounter is not a reason to get drunk. Getting drunk probably won't reduce your stress because things that were there the night before are still with you the next morning. And usually, your problems are worse because now your head hurts," Peterson said.

Peterson also spoke about personal happiness, handling stress and relationships.

The only person who can make a person happy is that person, she said.

"If you wait for people to make you happy, it will be a hell of a long time. You can only make yourself happy," she said.

A few tips for students feeling bogged down with stress include doing some fun activities.

"Learn the words to a new song, go out and buy a toy you always wanted when you were little but never got, and don't make any excuses for 24 hours," she said.

Some of Peterson's keys to happiness included encouraging youth, apologizing if you were wrong, thanking someone and laughing.

Both men and women want to be loved and needed for what they are on the inside, Peterson said.

Peterson referred to a list of what men and women want the opposite sex to know about them. The list was made by K-State students a few years ago.

"Men wanted women to know that they like receiving gifts and flowers, too, women can call men, men cry, too, and silence doesn't mean they are mad," she said.

"Women wanted men to know they can drive places too, successful women don't have to be married and have children, and women can like sports, too."

A standing ovation ended the evening after Peterson read "Oh the Places You'll Go" by Dr. Suess.

Jamie Van Hecke, senior in speech pathology, was required to attend because she is the new member educator for Delta Delta Delta.

"I thought she was very down-to-earth. She talked about true life issues," Van Hecke said.

Katie Laux, freshman undecided, also said Peterson spoke at a level students could understand.

"I thought she came to our level, she spoke to us about what we are feeling and what we have to deal with our first year in college," Laux said.

Peterson said that if she could give the group any gift, she would make everyone 7 years old again.

"When you were 7, you got excited over everything. You didn't judge somebody because of facial features or color of skin. You just loved them for who they were," she said.

▶ GRADUATE EXAM

Kaplan prepares students for tests

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

With the Graduate Record Examination, or GRE, less than two weeks away, many students are starting to feel a little uncomfortable.

Each year, Kaplan, the nation's largest test-preparation company, provides practice materials, tools and classes for students preparing for the GRE and about 19 other standardized tests. Kaplan has 160 centers throughout the United States and abroad.

Trent Anderson, director of pregraduate programs at Kaplan, said students are given a personal plan of study to help them prepare for the exam.

"We ask the students questions, and we combine their major concerns to design their plan of study," he said.

Karen Frayser, senior in biochemistry, took the Kaplan course last spring to help her prepare for the MCAT.

"The thing I thought it was best at was that it gave me resources to study with," she said.

Kaplan uses a variety of tools in its courses to help prepare students for examinations. Along with classroom instruction, there are also tutoring workshops, home study materials, educational software and a library with practice tests and exercises.

"People learn in different ways. We provide students with many different ways to study," Anderson said.

Chris Brown, senior in Spanish, said the materials Kaplan uses are first-rate and the course helped build his confidence in taking the MCAT.

"It does a lot for your peace of mind. When I scored well on the practice tests, I went in to take the real test with more confidence," he said.

A series of lessons to cover all the content in the exam and helpful strategies are taught so students can understand how questions will be phrased on the test, Anderson said.

Testing opportunities are set up to give students many opportunities to prepare for exams.

"We took a mid-term called virtual reality. It was an all-day test that was set up just like the real test," Frayser said. "It gave me great practice."

The Kaplan course costs about $800, Frayser said.

"This includes all the resources and everything you could use," Frayser said. "You can use the information from anywhere. I went to Kansas City over spring break and studied every day in the library there."

Anderson said Kaplan is the only provider that has permanent centers with libraries.

Frayser said that even though the course was helpful for her, she thought people could prepare for the test on their own.

"The benefit of the course is that it makes you study. It gives you the practice you need," she said.

Brown said he recommends the course for those who have the money to pay for it, but if students borrow someone's books, he said they could do just as well.

"You have to put a lot of work into it. They can't make you learn anything," Brown said.

▶ FACULTY

Changes may sacrifice education

Joni Pruitt
staff reporter

An ever-tightening budget has forced K-State to maximize its only remaining flexible resource — faculty time.

However, many faculty argue that the changes will sacrifice quality education.

The utilization of faculty time is the only resource the University has left since the Kansas Legislature has decreased funding and the student body is expected to increase by 20 percent in the next six years.

"Since almost 90 percent of the budget is invested in faculty time, we must readjust their time," John Havlin, president of Faculty Senate, said. "It's the only resource we have left."

The K-State faculty have three joint responsibilities: research, teaching and extension. Adjusting the equations of those responsibilities is one of the solutions the K-State Strategic Planning Committee is discussing.

This option would allow department heads to adjust the teaching and researching equations according to the individual interests or talents of each faculty member.

"Let's say a faculty member's strength is teaching, it would seem to make sense to let them teach," Curtis Kastner, chairman of the Strategic Planning Committee, said. "We have the latitude at the department level to let them emphasize their interests and strengths."

Although teachers are given joint teaching and researching responsibilities, the research responsibility is more strongly emphasized. Faculty are promoted primarily because of their research projects, Phil Anderson, arts and sciences faculty senator, said.

However, research often takes away time that could be spent in the classroom. With enrollment expected to increase in the next six years, there will be a greater need for teachers to spend more time in classrooms.

"Many faculty come to the University because of their passion for teaching, and research takes away from it," Havlin said. "We're a major research institution, and we need good researchers. But if a teacher's passion is students, why shouldn't they be allowed to teach more?"

> "Many faculty come to the University because of their passion for teaching, and research takes away from it. We're a major research institution, and we need good researchers. But if a teacher's passion is students, why shouldn't they be allowed to teach more?"

> JOHN HAVLIN, PRESIDENT OF FACULTY SENATE

As a result, faculty members often engage in lower-quality research projects just to meet the criteria for tenure.

"When faculty are doing research that is a lower quality just to fulfill a research requirement to earn tenure, then we need to let them do more teaching," Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said.

Students and surrounding communities also suffer as a result of placing a greater emphasis on researching.

"We can do a whole lot of research, but if we don't do a good job teaching and in extension, then our information will be in a box," said Stephen Scheneman, leader of professional and organizational development. "Since students and taxpayers are paying for this, they want information they can apply.

"It would be like the corporate sector which totally researched and made quality products but did no marketing or sales," he said. "The product is just hanging out there. We need to be customer-orientated. They're the ones buying the products."

On the other hand, faculty who have a primary interest in researching are often forced to spend unwanted time in the classroom. The result is a lower quality in teaching, Havlin said.

A letter sent to Provost James Coffman on Sept. 14, James Hamilton, philosophy department head, and Charles Thompson, professor of psychology, said were concerned the faculty time adjustment would place more distance between the faculty and students.

"Many of us think the main advantage of the plan, the sheer ability to increase numbers of students taught, is more than outweighed by the real educational and political dangers of increasing the distance between students and faculty," the letter said. "What parents and legislators correctly complain about in higher education is that students do not get sufficient contact with professors."

David Byrne, co-director of the office of educational advancement, said in response that mechanisms would have to be implemented in the time readjustment plan to ensure faculty and student relationships don't suffer.

Also, many faculty have expressed concern that the overall quality of research will suffer if the responsibilities are adjusted.

"I don't see how you can do this without impacting research," Hamilton said. "I think they're going to have to explain how that's going to happen."

"I'm hesitant because people who don't devote as much time to research won't be as sharp in their teaching," he said.

Kastner said the plan would still require faculty to stay informed about new developments in their field, but they would not have to do an official project.

"Just because you're not working on a research project doesn't mean you're not finding out the most current technologies," Kastner said. "It would take some initiative of the faculty who prominently teach to stay up with the cutting edge technology."

The proponents of this plan said they would not take away the importance of research but simply equalize the emphasis placed on teaching and researching.

"We get into this pointless debate of which to accent, research or teaching," Coffman said. "We need to mix the two, and we must optimize this mix."

"I think the reason this debate keeps happening is that people see it in terms of what we do now, instead of looking at new ideas where we don't have this trade off between the two," he said.

Byrne said the provost is starting from scratch when he is evaluating how to change educational procedures.

"Let's suppose somebody says, you get to redo how the U.S. government does things," Byrne said. "You get to start from scratch. What would you do? That's the question the provost is asking."

Byrne said the faculty's skepticism of the plan is understandable.

"I think the prospects of change cause concern, and they should," he said. "If you have these habits and someone says we must change, it's scary. It's not a matter of who's right and who's wrong or who's good and who's bad."

The option to read just faculty time is still in the process of debate, and an official decision will not be made until the end of the school year.

"Some people are skeptical that we have an agenda," Coffman said. "What is at hand is making the right diagnosis and the right prescription. This is the year for getting the game plan into place."

Suspects' pleas differ in Jordan murder case

Associated Press

LUMBERTON, N.C. — A man charged with murdering Michael Jordan's father was interrogated for hours before his Miranda rights were read, and then he stopped talking, an investigator testified Wednesday.

The testimony came during a hearing in Robeson County Superior Court to keep out of evidence the statement made by Daniel Andre Green on Aug. 14-15, 1993.

Green, 20, who has legally changed his name to Lord D As-saddiq Al-amin Salaam U'allah, has pleaded innocent to the capital murder charge of robbing and killing James Jordan.

Green and Larry Martin Demery were arrested and charged with first-degree murder and robbery. Demery pleaded guilty in April and agreed to testify against Green.

A former sheriff's department investigator testified that he regarded Green as a suspect and hoped to charge him for murder when he first went to Green's residence.

During the interrogation that started around midnight and ended 4 to 4-1/2 hours later, Art Binder testified, Green was lied to several times in an attempt to get him to tell the truth.

Binder testified that Green was free to leave during much of the interrogation.

"I never tried to trick him. I just let him know I knew what I was talking about," Binder said.

District Attorney Johnson Britt said during a break in the hearing that officers aren't required to read Miranda rights against self-incrimination to a suspect unless the person has been arrested or detained without charges.

The defense motion contends Green was denied his right to an attorney during the interview, wasn't allowed to talk to family and friends and that the entire statement he gave shouldn't be used in his trial. The trial is expected to start later this year, possibly in November.

Defense attorney Angus Thompson said Binder offered Green hope that he wouldn't be charged with a capital crime if he cooperated with investigators. Binder admitted he lied to Green when he said he didn't believe he had shot Jordan.

Rodney Dangerfield might not get any respect from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, but his page on the Net is one of the best.

He has included a picture archive with many celebrities, such as Jim Carrey and Bob Saget. Numerous bits of his stand-up routine are in text form. There are also sound files and video clips to download.

Miles' TV
(http://www.csua.berkeley.edu/~miles/ontv.html)
Surfers can watch someone else watch television, via a camera connected to the computer of a guy named Miles. The pictures change every few seconds, and sometimes you can see ol' Miles sitting on the couch.

Beer
(http://realbeer.com/rbp/)
Ahhhh ... nectar of the gods. Features a complete library with hundreds of variations of quarters and card games. These drinking games provide added incentive to consume. And like the "Real Beer Page" says: Who needs a reason?

Links to various microbreweries can keep any enthusiast chuggin' beer info 'till the keg runs dry.

This page does have the habit of pausing occasionally, but any difficulties encountered are insignificant compared to the page's beauty.

Tarot readings
(http://www.iii.net/users/dtking/tarot.html)
Want an educated guess on what your score will be on that biology exam? The "Tarot Resources" home page has the answers.

This page is designed for both beginners and expert readers. Surfers can learn about the different card spreads, differences in decks or advanced interpretation with a wave of a mouse. The page also contains links to fantasy artwork.

Links to the various automated pages that will read your future are included along with different programs that will make your computer psychic — without paying $4.95 per minute.

and ... Twinkies?
(http://www.rice.edu/~gouge/twinkies.html)
Science has advanced remarkably in recent years, but one area was still lacking ... until now.

"The T.W.I.N.K.I.E.S. Project" vaults science into the 21st century with important scientific research on everyone's favorite mass-produced, individually wrapped, cream-filled pastry: the Twinkie.

Surfers can see what happens when a Twinkie is hurled from a six-story building or nuked for 10 minutes in a microwave. This research also includes insight into the question that has plagued philosophers for ages: Which is more intelligent — a college sophomore or a Twinkie?

▲ After breaking the fast, Aizenman carries a packed plate of food as he prepares to devour his first bites in the last 25 hours. The fast was part of the Jewish holiday Yom Kippur.

Day of atonement

Adult Jews, including females above 12 years old and males above 13 years old, are normally required to fast, unless they are sick.

Prayers, like the Kol Nidre, ask God to forget the unfinished contracts of the past and future. The congregation also prayed for repentance. And other prayers remembered those who died in God's name, like the Jews of Nazi Germany.

The Jews of World War II are close to the heart of Aizenman's family, who escaped to Latin America from Poland in the early 1930s, Aizenman said.

As a child, Aizenman's mother hid during the Nazi occupation of France.

Today, the Aizenman family lives in Costa Rica.

Aizenman, an exchange student at K-State, said about 3,000 Jews live in the country, all of whom descended from the survivors of Hitler's Europe.

The Jewish population, concentrated in San Jose, Costa Rica, is more conservative than the Manhattan congregation, Aizenman said.

"At first I felt out of place, but now I feel at home," he said.

Aizenman, who has two older sisters and an older brother, is president of the K-State branch of B'nai B'rith Hillel, the Jewish student organization.

Although close to 40 students belong to Hillel, only fifteen are regulars attenders at meetings.

Aizenman said he is worried about the state of the group, and he said he wants to find more members who are concerned and can become involved.

Hillel is more than just a religious group — it is also a social group.

"You can get to know other Jewish people," he said.

During the Havdalah, a short concluding service, a special candle is lit and spices are smelled to commemorate the end of a Sabbath.

About 80 people, including children, watched and participated in Havdalah.

The Sabbath ended with a break-the-fast Wednesday night. Breads, cheeses, smoked salmon and frozen yogurt were consumed by hungry participants eating their first meal in 25 hours.

The group ate, talked and remembered the joy of eating as the night ended, with spices and food lingering in the air.

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

As part of the tradition of Yom Kippur, Aizenman rested in his Putnam Hall room throughout the day. Aizenman said he was trying not to think about food and spent most of his time reading and watching television.

Test proves kids take candy from strangers

Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Parents and school officials were upset after a radio station worker gave candy tablets to kids outside a school as part of a morning bit on National Children's Health Day.

School officials thought the tablets were vitamin pills.

Omaha radio station KQKQ apologized on the air Wednesday for upsetting parents but said the unauthorized stunt taught an important lesson: Despite the warnings, kids still take candy from strangers.

General Manager Marty Riemenschneider said the bit Monday at Hillside Elementary School was not authorized by the station and emphasized that no one was hurt and no vitamins or pills were involved, just candy.

Seven students told school officials they had taken the candy. Hillside has about 400 students in kindergarten through sixth grade.

Worried parents called the principal, station and school district. Principal Fran Carr sent parents a letter Tuesday saying he had warned students over the school intercom after the incident about the importance of never taking anything from strangers.

In a statement aired three times Wednesday morning, Riemenschneider said the station apologized if anyone was offended, especially parents and school officials.

"However," he said, "let's face reality. A young man in an unmarked car was able to go onto school grounds and pass out candy to students.

"There is a lesson to be learned here," he said. Even with all the warnings and continuing education about strangers on school yards, parents and the schools need to do an even better job of pointing out the risks of dealing with strangers on school property."

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

tightened from 40 percent advertisements to 45 percent ads, she said. That means 45 percent of the Collegian's content is ads and 55 percent is news stories.

If the fee money were to decrease, the news hole would have to be made even smaller.

"Of course, the ad staff is always looking for new ways to make money," Freeland said.

One promotion the ad staff is working on this fall is a Friday the 13th and Halloween promo. If advertisers purchases ads for both promotions, they will receive 13 percent off the second ad, she said.

"Most of the student fees go into student salaries and benefits," Freeland said.

Only about $2,000 of the $280,181 from the fee is left to cover the other expenses of providing a daily newspaper, she said.

She said she thought a user-fee system could damage the advertising base of the Collegian.

"The effect would probably be that the circulation would decrease," Freeland said.

With decreased circulation comes a decrease in advertisers, she said.

Linda Puntney, yearbook adviser and assistant director of Student Publications, said she would rather see more students get the Royal Purple.

"I would like to see every student on campus get the book with their activity fee," Puntney said.

She said every school she knows that has no support through fees has financial difficulties in producing a yearbook.

Puntney said that at the end of fee payment, Royal Purple sales were down by 700 books, but book sales have decreased during fee payment for the past several years.

Instead, the staff has been working on other promotions to get more students in the yearbook so students will purchase books. One of the special promotions the staff started is called Shoot Yourself.

In February, a student and up to six friends can get their picture taken at the K-State Student Union. The Royal Purple also started taking portrait pictures for the yearbook in the living groups instead of in the Union.

"We're trying to make it easy for people to get in the book," Puntney said.

The staff has also started to send postcards to people who have not purchased a book but will appear in the book to remind them to order the Royal Purple.

"We've added advertisements in the book to increase our funds and not increase the cost of the book," Puntney said.

She said all the marketing of the book is done by the same 12 or 13 people who are producing the book. They are constantly trying new ideas for selling the book.

Students do not have bottomless pockets, and recognizing that, Student Publications is thankful for what it gets through fees, Johnson said.

Clouse said he thought user fees would be detrimental to Student Publications as a whole.

"I think overall, a truly user-based fee would mean the end of Student Publications Inc. as we know it," Clouse said.

"It might exist as a fraction of what we know it as now."

He said he thought user fees would price students out of yearbooks and the newspaper because the production costs are high.

"If the price of the yearbook reflected its actual production cost, few, if any, students would be able to afford one," Clouse said.

He said he sees privilege fees as similar to taxation by the federal income tax. Everyone has to pay taxes, but they do not take advantage of all the services provided with the tax money.

"I think the concept of a user-based fee system is probably more fair to students, but I think that fairness is outweighed by a decrease in the quality of service that we see on campus," Clouse said.

Everyone has the opportunity to benefit from the services provided with student fees, he said. Those who choose not to use a service are helping pay the way for students who use the service.

Student Publications also has a $1.90 equipment fee, which is used to maintain and replace the computers, printers and other equipment used in producing the Collegian, Royal Purple and the Campus Directory. The equipment fee was reviewed last spring and passed.

Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said he thought there were probably more ways to make Student Publications a user fee.

"You can't really do it with the Collegian," he said. "You're not going to have a paper stand."

Some students do not realize Student Publications is more than just the Collegian, he said.

The Royal Purple and the campus directory are also partially funded with the student fees, and Tomb said he wants to see if they can be completely funded by user fees.

"Every student pays for the services, but lots of them don't take advantage," Tomb said. "We have to ask if it's possible to shift the whole burden to those who use it."

Tomb said Student Publications always provides the fee committee with good information about how much money each student pays for the services it provides.

"It was nice to see where the money goes," he said.

User fee would limit Student Pub

Students pay $7.80 for the Student Publications fee each semester. The fee allows students to get the Collegian for free every day, and subsidizes the Royal Purple yearbook and the Campus Directory.

Some members of the Student Governing Association have proposed making the Student Publications fee a user fee so that only students who want the Collegian, Royal Purple and Campus Directory would pay for them. Although each student would save $7.80 a semester with a user-fee system, the Collegian would no longer be free to students, and the Royal Purple would double in cost.

| Collegian – | Royal Purple – | Campus Directory – |
|---|---|---|
| In fiscal year 1995, the average per-copy cost of each Collegian was 33 cents. Students paid 5.76 cents for each copy through student fees designated for the Collegian. # Krauss takes 4 CMA awards

Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Alan Jackson was named entertainer of the year and Alison Krauss won best female vocalist and three other Country Music Association awards Wednesday at the Grand Ole Opry House.

Jackson, the top nominee with six nominations, won the highest award just when it looked like he would go home without a trophy.

He was nominated but didn't win for best male vocalist, album, single, vocal event (with George Jones) and video.

"I've been playing from truck-stop lounges several years ago to 50,000 people at the Houston Astrodome," Jackson said after the show. "I feel qualified (to win)."

Krauss, the premier bluegrass singer and a formidable fiddler, had never even been nominated by CMA voters before this year. She won in all four categories in which she competed: female vocalist, the Horizon Award for most promising artist, best single ("When You Say Nothing at All") and vocal event for a duet with the group Shenandoah, "Somewhere in the Vicinity of the Heart."

"I'm going to have to go get a flask or something!" Krauss said the fourth time she was called to the podium. She looked increasingly mystified at each trip. "This is really weird, you guys," she said twice.

Vince Gill, the host of the show, won an unprecedented fifth straight male vocalist award.

No one else has won more than two in a row, with the most recent back-to-back win that of Randy Travis in 1987-1988.

Gill was unseated by Jackson after two years as entertainer of the year.

Brooks & Dunn kept a streak going with their fourth straight vocal duo nod, matching legendary twosomes The Judds and Conway Twitty and Loretta Lynn.

The Judds ruled from 1988-1991, and Twitty and Lynn from 1972-1975.

Fiddler Mark O'Connor won musician of the year for the fifth straight year: "It seems like it's a good night for fiddlers," he said.

Country Music Award winners

Here are the results of the Country Music Awards Wednesday night.

In other categories, new blood broke through.

The Mavericks ended a three-year reign by Diamond Rio in the vocal group category, and Patty Loveless' "When Fallen Angels Fly" upset offerings by John Michael Montgomery, George Strait, Gill and Jackson to win best album.

Gretchen Peters, a songwriter on the verge of launching her own recording career, won the best-song award for "Independence Day," a hit she wrote for Martina McBride.

The show, broadcast live on CBS, began with a sexy entrance by Shania Twain, who vamped her way through the audience while singing her hit, "Any Man of Mine."

Other standout performances: Mary Chapin Carpenter on a stately "Where Time Stands Still" and a duet by Faith Hill and Shelby Lynne backed by a gospel choir, "Keep Walkin' On."

Russ Taff, a contemporary Christian performer trying to conquer the country market, made humorous points with a short ditty he announced was an attempt to "suck up" to radio programmers, while Montgomery performed fresh from throat surgery.

Singer-songwriter Roger Miller ("King of the Road"), who died in 1992, was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame. Wife Mary Miller, a former member of Kenny Rogers and the First Edition, accepted on his behalf.

Pope: Policies should protect poor

Associated Press

NEWARK, N.J. — Sidestepping differences on such issues as abortion, President Clinton joined Pope John Paul II in an impassioned plea Wednesday for social policies that protect the poor and keep families together.

Vatican officials suggested the pope had congressional Republican efforts to restrain spending and redirect social policy in mind when he made his remarks.

Welcoming the religious leader of 60 million American Catholics, the president said, "We Americans are people of faith expressed in many ways."

His remarks, in a steady rain in front of 2,000 U.S. schoolchildren, came as the pontiff opened his fifth trip to America as pope. The leaders were meeting privately later and then attending an evening prayer service.

In a news conference aboard his plane en route to the United States, the pontiff reiterated his opposition to the U.S. embargo against Cuba.

'Education, education, education.'

■ Elders urges education in a health-ignorant society

Nikola Zytkow
staff reporter

The fight against AIDS, poverty, child abuse and racism begins with education.

"We've tried ignorance, now let's try education," former U.S. Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders said at the Thursday evening Lou Douglas lecture.

Before Elders uttered a word, she was greeted with a standing ovation from the tightly packed audience at McCain Auditorium.

Elders smiled and waved at the audience, but when the applause died down she was strictly business in the message she wanted to impress upon K-State students and faculty.

"We have a health-ignorant society," Elders said. "The problem is we don't have a health care system. We have a very expensive sick-care system."

America can no longer afford to look the other way, Elders said.

"One out of every 250 Americans is HIV-positive. Twenty-one percent have genital herpes," she said. "Yet we still live in a society that totally denies that our children have sex."

Elders' frankness on sexual issues caused her resignation Dec. 1, 1994. At a United Nations conference on AIDS, Elders said she was wrongly interpreted as an advocate of teaching little children how to masturbate.

"Nobody needs to teach anybody how to masturbate. God taught us how to masturbate," she said.

When discussing masturbation, Elders said children should be given honest answers about masturbation. The myth that masturbation causes hair to grow on hands, or children to go crazy needs to be dispelled, she said.

For her, the forced resignation was just a bend in the road, not the end of the road, she said.

"When I went to Washington as your surgeon general, I went there not to get the job — I already had a job. I went there to do the job," Elders said.

Abundant applause showed support of Elders' views. The atmosphere was a lot different on Capitol Hill, where she received criticism for her views, Elders said.

"I was criticized because I supported choice for women," Elders said. "I don't feel our politicians can sit on God's judgment seat and make the decisions."

Neither the Catholic church nor the government can ever know the personal experiences people face, Elders said. A celibate, male-dominated church and male-dominated legislature should not be in the business of telling women what to do with their bodies.

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

Joycelyn Elders, former U.S. Surgeon General, speaks to a packed house about sexual issues as part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

"Organized religion needs to stop moralizing from the pulpits on Sunday and instead get up and get to work," Elders said.

The church did not speak out for 400 years while such travesties as slavery, injustices done to American Indians and the Holocaust were going on, Elders said.

One by one, her comments were received with thundering applause, as well as a bit of laughter at some of her more humorous comments.

"I was also called the condom queen," Elders said. "But, I want you all to know that I would put the crown on my head and sleep in it."

Teaching young people and their parents how to talk about sex is crucial in this dangerous age of AIDS and increasing teenage pregnancy, she said.

"We've allowed the streets, TV and girlie magazines to teach our children. We don't want the teacher to teach them?" Elders said.

Not only do young people need to know about safe sex, but they also need to know about taking responsibility for their actions, she said.

"We've got to teach our young men to be responsible," Elders said. "We've allowed many of our young men to go around donating sperm."

Cuts being proposed in Congress, like cuts in welfare and school lunches, are not the answer, she said.

Eighteen percent of the gross national product goes toward defense. Health and education is being eliminated from budgetary priorities.

"What we're going to have is a country of sick

Senators pass allocation bill

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate approved an allocation bill for Speech Unlimited Thursday night.

Because the Arts and Sciences Council has no record of an allocation to Speech Unlimited for this year, Janelle Moore, arts and sciences senator, proposed an amendment that would have added $1,292 to the $5,000 allocation for the team from Senate.

An allocation to the agriculture competition teams made earlier this semester for $15,000 left $6,292 in the academic competition team account for other groups that qualify for funding from the account.

"If it passes as is, there will be $1,290 approximately left in the account," Chris Avila, Allocations Committee chairman, said.

Competition teams are exempt from the funding guideline policy that prohibits groups from getting money from student fees twice. They can receive funding from college councils and the competition team fund.

Aaron Otto, Arts and Sciences Council treasurer, said the council did not allocate the group any money during the spring semester for this year.

"There's been a massive misunderstanding on whether we funded them $2,000 last year," he said.

The council will be making a decision on funding for the group in the next two weeks, Otto said.

"We need this money the same as the ag competition teams need their money," Moore said. "We set a precedent two weeks ago for first-come, first-served."

Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, suggested funding for the Society for the Advancement of Management come from money that was already allocated to the agriculture competitions teams.

Senate Chairman John Potter said because the agriculture competitions teams bill had already been signed by the student body president, any changes to the allocation would have to come in bill form.

SAM sent a letter dated Sept. 26 asking for $1,500, Avila said. The allocation has not been looked at by the Allocations Committee because SAM has also placed a request with the Business Council, he said.

"If the allocation passed as is, with-

Lack of ethics spurs resignation

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Problems with Student Senate appointments resulted in the resignation of a senator and brought on an attempt by Senate to go into executive session Sept. 28.

Renee Fisher, arts and sciences senator, resigned Sept. 28 and said she was leaving Senate because of her own ethical concerns.

"I didn't quit to spite anyone," Fisher said. "I just couldn't be a part of what was going on in Senate anymore."

Fisher said several things happened that left her no choice but to stand up for what she believed in and leave Senate.

"There were things going on behind closed doors and behind people's backs," she said.

She gave two reasons for her resignation.

Janelle Moore, arts and sciences senator, was appointed as Student Activities and Social Services Committee chairwoman Aug. 24 without any advertising being done for the position.

According to the Student Governing Association Constitution, the Senate chairman may make committee chair selections to fill vacancies left by resignations without advertising, but Fisher said she did not think it was right to do so.

Another problem she said she had with Senate was the changing of committee appointments after the legislation deadline had passed. One name was changed on the Holton Hall Advisory Board appointment resolution after the executive committee met on Sept. 12.

Arts and sciences senator Jeff Sweat's name was on the original Holton Hall Advisory Board appointment legislation.

Sweat served on the board last year, and he had spoken to Senate chairman John Potter on two separate occasions about wanting to be on the board.

The Senate chairman makes appointments, and Senate confirms.

Sweat researched the history of the board and wrote the legislation that revived the advisory board, which had not been active for several years.

Sweat was an at-large member of the SASS Committee last year and is a member of the committee this year. The advisory board governs a building that houses many student services, so SASS wanted a member of the committee on the advisory board.

Sweat told Potter he would serve on the board either as the Senate representative or as an at-large member. Sweat later decided he did not want to take the at-large position because he said he did not think a senator should have an at-

UPC loses $40,000 on Soul Asylum

contributing writer

As country chanteuse Barbara Mandrell once sang, "I was country when country wasn't cool," K-State is now cool once again.

K-State, deep down in your heart you're a country school, and you know it.

Monday's Union Program Council-sponsored Soul Asylum and Matthew Sweet concert, which failed to draw much of an audience, has reinforced the reality that Manhattan's alternative music scene is dead on arrival.

Patrick Carney, UPC president, said "students can thank themselves" for the failure of the music scene and the subsequent cancellation of plans for a spring 1996 concert.

"We expected to take some loss on this concert, but not this big a loss," Carney said.

Sarah Hadley, acting director of UPC, said the concert cost about $57,000 to produce. That number includes Bramlage, the $40,000 guarantee to the bands, rental of equipment and catering.

Only 1,016 tickets were sold at about $18 each. That equates to about $18,000, which means UPC's out-of-pocket expense runs close to $40,000.

"We've experienced a bigger loss than we've ever experienced," Hadley said.

Carney said UPC won't know how much they've lost on the concert until one and a half months down the road.

However, the loss won't affect UPC's other programming. There won't be any speakers or trips canceled due to the concert's failure.

UPC's Special Events Committee produced the concert, but its programming, except a spring concert, will remain the same.

Carney said because money was made on last year's concerts and UPC had structured safety nets into its budget, the money lost on the concert will only affect future concerts and not all programming.

Recreation complex fee might be replaced with user fees

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex could be another target of user fees if the system is successfully implemented this year.

Under a user-fee system, students would pay for the services they use at the Rec Complex. Only the students who use the Rec Complex would have to pay for upkeep and the repair and replacement of equipment.

The Rec Complex fee is not up for review by Student Senate this year, but the fee could eventually be changed to a user fee.

Raydon Robel, Rec Complex director, said the complex gets its operating budget from the student fees. Students pay $10 to the Rec Complex for maintenance and services.

"Student fee money is the primary source for our operating budget," Robel said.

Fee money is used to pay student salaries for officials, lifeguards and other employees, including the office staff. Robel's salary is the only one not paid for with student fee money, he said.

The Rec Complex is able to offer free aerobics classes and services because it receives student fee money. The cost to enter an intramural team would increase from $10 to about $75, he said. In the old building, 1,800 students used the Rec Complex on a daily basis.

"With the new building this fall, we're already seeing upward around 3,000 students every day," Robel said.

If the fee became a user fee, the cost to a student for the same services would be comparable to $30 to $40 per month, Robel said.

Right now, students have a full membership at the Rec Complex for the $10 student fee, including the maintenance fee. Students cannot get a membership at any of the local health clubs for a comparable amount of money, Robel said.

"You would lose a lot of the things you have gained," Robel said.

The Rec Complex expansion is in its last phases, and many improvements have been made possible through fee money. If the maintenance fee for the Rec Complex was made user only, the students would lose much of what they gained, he said.

"With user fees, you're going to destroy a lot of the Rec programs, as well as other programs on campus," Robel said.

While it may be easy to look at the dollar sign, students need to keep in mind the quality of the program, he said.

"K-State has a lot for the money," Robel said. "I hope people go into this with their eyes wide open."

Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said he wanted students to know the Rec Complex fee will not be up for review this year.

Although the Rec Complex fee isn't going to be reviewed this year,

User fee would end some Rec programs

Students pay $10 to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for maintenance and services each semester. Fee money is used to pay student salaries for officials, lifeguards and other employees, including the majority of the office staff.

With a user-fee system, students would pay for the services they use at the Rec Complex. Only the students who use the Rec Complex would have to pay for upkeep and the repair and replacement of equipment.

- A Manhattan Athletic Club three-month membership is $126 with a one-time initiation fee of $20. They will do a body-fat test and a fitness assessment. This includes use of all the facilities including the lockers.
- Rec Complex use is free to students.
- The Rec Complex is able to offer free aerobics classes and services because it receives student fee money.
- With a user-fee system, the cost to enter an intramurals team would increase from $10 to about $75.
- There is not an additional charge to use Rec Complex exercise equipment.
- If the fee became a user fee, the cost to a student for the same services would be comparable to $30 to $40 per month.

TOUCHDOWN CANNON SILENCED WITH SUCCESS OF WILDCAT FOOTBALL

Wildcat home games traditionally have booming scores, thanks to the Phi Kappa Tau cannon that bangs out purple smoke with each touchdown.

But the black signal cannon has been silenced this season. The cannon, which is usually perched in the grassy area in the north end zone, has been moved because seating was needed.

"They basically kind of forgot us when they went to set up the extra seats," said Josh Nelson, sophomore in humanities and a Phi Tau.

Bill McNally, events coordinator for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said he is trying to find a safe place to re-locate the cannon.

"I know they're a little upset about it, but there's nothing we can do," McNally said.

The noise, powder and 10-feet repercussion firing area require the cannon to have an unoccupied area.

"I've got to be very cautious about where we put the cannon because of the powder," McNally said.

Philip Bures, junior in park resource management and cannon crew chief, said an ideal location would be closer to the alumni side, but the cannon would have to be placed on top of a stand.

McNally is brainstorming for places to put the cannon.

"Where can you put them?" he said.

McNally is working hard to find the cannon a place for the University of Kansas and K-State game, he said.

"I know it's part of a K-State tradition," he said.

The tradition began when the new members class of 1962 at Phi Tau stole the cannon from the front porch of an area farmer, Nelson said.

The fraternity began firing the weapon at every home game, and the farmer soon recognized and claimed his cannon. However, the farmer owned the cast for the cannon and offered to make an original to fire for every Wildcat touchdown.

"That's the way we've done it since 1962," Nelson said.

Saturday, the cannon will be in the Phi Tau house, waiting to be in the limelight again.

COLUMBIA LAUNCH SCHEDULED

Space Shuttle Columbia, carrying several K-State experiments, was tentatively scheduled to launch at 8:40 today from Kennedy Space Center in Florida.

The orbiter's flight was delayed for more than a week due to hydrogen leakage from its disposable tank.

Navy Commander Kenneth Bowersox and six other astronauts will remain in space for 16 days.

The experiments designed by K-State students and faculty include studies of viruses and cancer cells, as well as other biological payloads.

Some of the experiments were designed by BioServe Space Technologies, which has offices at K-State.

POLICE INVESTIGATING BREAK-IN

The investigation into the Aug. 20 break-in that allegedly involved members of the K-State football team continues.

Though the case has been sent to County Attorney Bill Kennedy's office, police are still questioning individuals involved.

"We have all of the names, but we're still talking to people," Capt. Steven French of the Riley County Police Department said. "I don't know why Kennedy hasn't done anything with it yet. He's probably waiting for the full report."

JUDGE CONSIDERING BOOK BAN

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) — A federal judge is expected to decide within a month whether a school district's ban on a novel about homosexuality violates students' free speech rights.

U.S. District Judge Thomas Van Bebber heard the final witnesses Wednesday in the case brought by several students, their parents and a biology teacher against the Olathe School District.

At issue is the removal of the novel "Annie on My Mind" from the Olathe South High School library after it was donated in 1993 by a gay-advocacy group. A copy had already been in the library for years.

Richard Marriott, one of four school board members who voted for the ban, said he found the novel to be predictable and that it glorified the homosexual lifestyle.

The critically acclaimed book about two girls who fall in love was written in the late 1970s by Massachusetts writer Nancy Garden. She testified earlier in the trial.

School board president Bob Drummond, a psychologist, testified last month he considered homosexuality a mental disorder similar to schizophrenia or depression.

School officials said they were exercising their right to choose material for students and their right not to succumb to a special-interest group.

Protesters picket during Elders' visit to K-State

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Three freshmen wearing homemade T-shirts proclaiming "The only real evil is ignorance" danced in front of the Students for the Right to Life protesters at Former U.S. Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders lecture Thursday.

"We heard that the protesters were going to be here and wanted to show that there are more open-minded people," Jennifer Renner, freshman in interior design, said.

Despite rumors of Fred Phelps picketing the lecture, he failed to travel from his home in Topeka.

"That's fine that they have their opinion. We were really hoping that Fred Phelps was going to be here. We had a few comments for him," Renner said.

About 15 members of the Students for the Right to Life held signs protesting Elders and handed out pamphlets to people going into McCain Auditorium.

"The main reason we are protesting is because Planned Parenthood is the organization that lobbied and pushed for Dr. Elders' nomination to surgeon general," said Bob Macha, junior in biology and pre-law and spokesperson for Students for the Right to Life.

Students for the Right to Life handed out two different brochures that listed Elders' ideas about controversial issues and Planned Parenthood founder Margaret Sanger's promotion of abortion to aid in the extermination of black people.

"We feel that Joycelyn Elders is not qualified to speak for Racial Ethnic Harmony Week," said Jennifer Talkington, sophomore in speech pathology and president of Students for the Right to Life. "She promotes pro-choice. She is a woman of color and supports the killing of her race by supporting Planned Parenthood. The basic goal of Planned Parenthood was to exterminate the black race."

Talkington said it is a hypocrisy for a woman of color who supports Planned Parenthood to speak at Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

The group began picketing about 45 minutes before the speech but were soon asked by K-State Police to stand in the grassy area on the west side of McCain.

"The only free-speech area on campus is the area in front of the Union and by the clock at Anderson Hall. That's what I and the officers have been told," a dispatcher for campus police said.

Picketers were asked to stand in the grassy area to help campus police officers maintain security around the building, the dispatcher said.

The group was also asked to stop handing out pamphlets, but, despite this fact, the organization distributed 400 pamphlets.

Some students said the Students for the Right to Life was pushing its views on others.

"They were trying to push their views on others by being an annoyance," Tristan Kimbrell, freshman in biology, said. "They were not in public debate. They were more of a sideshow."

Week's activities to focus on homosexual community

■ Gay, lesbian, bisexual culture to be celebrated

Jonathan Yeomans
staff reporter

A week-long celebration of homosexuality and bisexuality begins Monday in the K-State Student Union.

The "Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Symposium: A Cultural Celebration" will discuss rhetoric, literature, law, religion, politics and drama pertaining to the gay, lesbian and bisexual life.

"We are excited about this conference," Shel Barry, senior in interior architecture, said.

"It is going to focus on the historical and cultural aspects of gay, lesbian and bisexual history," Barry said.

October is Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Month, and Oct. 11 is National Coming Out Day.

Next week, each day will focus on the different aspects of gay, lesbian and bisexual life.

"We want to bring forth a lot of information to the gay community that is helpful in the process of dealing with everyday situations," Barry said.

In the past, the conferences have focused on meeting the needs of the gay, lesbian or bisexual with respect and helping them feel better about themselves and their sexuality.

This year, the agenda focuses on a variety of topics.

"I like the set up this year. It's more for us to learn about ourselves, know what our rights are — a lot to do with politics," he said.

"Also, the general public is capable of learning," Barry said.

"We are hoping that people treat this like any other history week and go to learn and ask questions," he said.

Heather Nelson, senior in psychology, and Barry are co-presidents of BGLS this year.

Nelson said she does not expect any opposition to the conference.

"Usually, they stay away," she said.

This is the second year for the symposium, and BGLS is co-sponsoring the symposium with Manhattan's Flint Hills Alliance, a same-gender organization.

UPC inadvertently kills music scene at K-State

UPC did its best to provide what students wanted. But Manhattan can't become another Lawrence overnight.

Say good-bye.

The live music scene at K-State is through for a while.

The Union Programming Council lost $40,000 on the Soul Asylum/Matthew Sweet concert Monday night.

A little research might have gone a long way. The minimal success of two previous alternative music concerts, Live and the Dave Matthews Band, should have warned UPC that the big bucks toward Soul Asylum would go to waste.

And while UPC had no choice but to take Soul Asylum on a Monday night, it would have fared better if it had held off and waited for a band which could make it Wednesday through Saturday.

It's also a given that filling Bramlage Coliseum is nearly impossible for athletic events, much less concerts — not to mention students can't drink or smoke on the premises.

The concert couldn't even draw a crowd from Kansas City or Lawrence, because Soul Asylum played in Kansas City, Mo., Saturday night.

UPC did its best to provide what students wanted. But Manhattan can't become another Lawrence overnight.

Lawrence became a big name because it consistently brought in up-and-coming bands eager for publicity. UPC overshot itself by trying to start with big-time acts right off the bat.

More events like the recent OPUS concert is UPC's ticket to a live-music scene.

And it's OK to let outside bands come to town — Lawrence certainly does.

But the first thing UPC needs to do is gamble with student money a little more carefully.

Haunted by memories,

Abuse victim thinks of O.J.'s children

I think I remember the first time my father hit me better than I remember my first day of school or any of my birthdays.

It was a Sunday. Dad was watching football on television and my brother, E.J., was playing ball in the house. My father told him not to. He said he was going to break something if he wasn't careful and if he did, my dad was going to make him sorry for it.

E.J. didn't listen to him. He didn't hear the warning in his voice and so kept playing. Soon after, it bounced onto an end table, knocking a lamp over onto the floor where it shattered.

I remember thinking as my father walked toward my brother, I hadn't ever heard him yell that loudly to either one of us. I knew the tone he was using. It was a special one he usually used with my mother right before he slapped or pushed her to the ground.

I was very protective of my brother. I didn't want to see him get hit, and so I attempted to run interference and got in my father's way. Daddy just pushed me out of his path, grabbed E.J.'s arm and dragged him into the kitchen. He went over to the utility drawer and took out a long, bright-orange extension cord.

"I'll teach you to listen to me," he kept saying. I could hear my brother screaming and so I started wailing too. This made my father angrier. He kept barking at me to shut up, but the more he yelled, the more I cried.

That's when my father snatched me by the back of the neck and hauled both of us into the back bedroom.

He told my brother and me to lay face down on our beds and hold onto the bed frame with both hands. My father then gave us five stripes apiece on our bare legs and buttocks with the cord.

I was 4 years old. My brother was 3.

I was reminded of this while watching the O.J. Simpson verdict on television. I don't care that he was acquitted. I was not on the jury, nor was I a member of either the prosecution or defense teams. I was not even, until the moment of the verdict, an interested viewer of the trial.

But when I heard the jury say "Not guilty," the only thing I could think of was that memory of my father and O.J. Simpson's young son and daughter.

COLUMN

ERIN MANSUR-SMITH

People cheered when he was acquitted. People called it a victory and said he was an innocent man. Innocent of murder, perhaps. It was a matter of debate whether Simpson killed his ex-wife. It was never a matter of debate that he beat her. It was never in question that he was an abuser.

Many would say the justice system failed when O.J. was not convicted of murder, but I saw the justice system failed much sooner. It failed with that man getting away with hitting his wife and doing no time — not when he possibly got away with killing her.

What is truly scary is that now Simpson goes to court to decide whether he will get custody of his two young children. I do not have any doubt in my mind that if O.J. Simpson is capable of hitting Nicole, he will do that to them.

Statistics from the Wednesday, Aug. 3 edition of the Kansas City Star show that in homes where domestic abuse occurs, child abuse is likely to follow. Child abuse is connected with domestic abuse at a rate of 1,500 percent.

With regard to my personal experiences, the instance I recalled for you was the first time I had ever been beaten. It was not to be the last. My father was often a savage man toward my younger brother and me. But his main focus was always on my mother.

Now that Nicole is gone, on whom will O.J. focus his violence? I hope it won't be Justin and Sydney. I hope they will never have to carry the memories I do.

▶ ROAMING BOOK-WAVERS

Editor,

The Gideons were back on campus Wednesday, harassing and bedeviling students with the words of God (paperback edition) and creating a backlog of pedestrians which stretched from Willard to Cardwell halls.

On the way to class, I was approached no less than four times by the Bible-wielding foot soldiers of Christ. Upon my return, I took an alternate route, hoping to elude solicitation. I failed, however, for these sentries had strategically peppered themselves all over the University.

The trouble is that official University policy dictates such solicitors, be they Gideons, Jehovah's Witnesses or members of the Flat Earth Society, must confine their efforts to officially designated Free Speech Zones.

For the uninitiated, there are three: the island north of the K-State Student Union, the quadrangle east of Calvin Hall and the quadrangle north of Farrell Library. Cardwell, Lafene Health Center and other places on campus are off limits.

Furthermore, those expressing their beliefs may not interfere with the flow of people on campus.

Unfortunately, according to those book-wavers with whom I spoke, no one informed them of this detail.This apparently includes the K-State police officer who was dispatched (per a student request) to relay the information.

Students have a voice in what happens on the campus they pay to maintain; we have the right to walk to class without hassle, or, if we choose, to visit a Free Speech Zone where all are free to accost us.

The rules that ensure this, however, are apparently not enforced, and they shall remain so until such time as it becomes politically unfavorable for the University to do nothing.

The next time someone attempts to ram literature down your throat outside of the designated zones, take a stand.

Go to the police and show them the perpetrator. Listen as they explain University policy and correct any misconceptions. It's your right.

Student government juggles user-fee issues

▶ Mark Tomb is the chairman of the Privilege Fee Committee. The committee views user fees as a modification to offset the cost of college.

Much has been written in the Collegian this last week dealing with fees and the concept of user fees, and this would be a good time to explain what some of us in student government are trying to accomplish.

We are not trying to eliminate services, and we are not trying to deny any services to any student.

We are merely taking a hard look at the way things are funded on campus.

We will be exploring the idea of a complete user fee, but much of our attention will be on partial user fees in most cases.

There will be no $30 aerobics classes at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex as some might want to believe, and health care won't be denied to any student.

Historically, students have been responsible for paying fees to areas on campus whether or not they get good service or even use the service.

The goal behind the user-fee concept is giving students the right to choose what services they want their money to pay for.

GUEST COLUMN

MARK TOMB

A user fee will replace or partially replace the fee that is currently charged, and the funding will shift to the students that use the service.

In doing this, the different services and agencies will be more responsive to student needs and provide a better service.

A few weeks ago, Student Senate passed a budget resolution.

This resolution simply asks the various agencies or committees that depend on student fee money to take a look at how they could convert their funding to a complete user fee and a partial user fee.

Many of the articles that have been written this week give examples of how student services will be crippled or become incredibly expensive with the concept of user fees. These scare tactics are arguments to complete user fees.

We have asked the committees and agencies involved to provide information on complete user fees so that we can make the most informed decision possible. We are not going to force this in areas that are not suited for user fees and, therefore, cripple services.

This is not a new concept at K-State. Many places on campus have had user fees for a number of years. Lafene Health Center and Student Publications Inc. are great examples of how partial user fees have worked on this campus.

We are now looking into the possibility of expanding these user fees and reducing the line-item fee.

With this tough look at fees, we will see if it is feasible to enact this concept.

The goal of a user fee is not to gut the current system.

It is a modification to the existing system that is a response to growing concern over the cost of higher education.

We feel we can do our share to control educational costs by studying the effect of user fees on the current system.

We don't claim to have all the answers on this important issue, so we need your help.

In the next few months, students will have many opportunities to become involved in the review of our fees.

We hope that we can have as many students as possible participate in forums, committee meetings and Student Senate.

We at student government are trying to come up with new and better ways to provide services on campus.

If you have any questions or concerns on fee issues, the Privilege Fee Committee meets at 8 p.m. Sundays in the small conference room in the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

Or you can call 532-6451.

SCANDAL

large position on a University committee.

Sweat said his name was on the legislation in the Senate position when it came up in Executive Committee Sept. 12.

Sweat said Russell Fortmeyer, engineering senator, overheard Senate Vice Chairman Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, tell Potter that he wanted Sweat removed from the advisory board Sept. 12 after the Executive Committee meeting. LeDoux, as Senate vice chairman, automatically serves as chairman of the advisory board.

The next day, Potter replaced Sweat's name with Graduate Senator Kyle Kessler's name on the bill.

Potter, as Senate chairman, has the constitutional authority to make appointments and change appointments. Potter never violated the constitution in making the appointments to the board.

Fisher confronted Potter about his conversation with LeDoux.

Potter and LeDoux both denied the conversation took place, although Potter later said LeDoux had talked to him about the appointment.

"I take Trent with a light-handed approach," Potter said. "I blew it off."

LeDoux declined to comment on the allegations, but he did publicly apologize to Sweat during Senate's final open period Oct. 5.

Potter said LeDoux's request was not the reason the appointment was changed. Potter said Kessler approached him Sept. 13 and asked to serve on a committee.

"I was very impressed," Potter said. "For a graduate senator to express an interest in serving on a committee shows dedication."

The only available appointment to a University committee was the Holton Hall Advisory Board, he said.

"I took Jeff's name off and put Kyle's name on," Potter said. "I had tried to call Mr. Sweat to inform him of the change. He was not at home."

Sweat said he did not find out about the appointment change until the Senate meeting Sept. 21.

Moore proposed an amendment to put Sweat back into the Senate position on the board.

Kessler said he had no problem with letting Sweat fill the appointment. Other senators were opposed, and the resolution was sent to the Senate Operations Committee.

It was not. Senate Operations Committee met Sept. 25 and ruled the amendment unconstitutional. The committee approved the legislation with Kessler still in the Senate representative position.

The committee ruled the amendment unconstitutional because according to the constitution, only the Senate chairman can make appointments. Senate only confirms or rejects the appointments.

Before Fisher decided to resign, she spoke with Tricia Nolfi, Senate adviser, about her concerns. At Nolfi's advice, Fisher went to the Executive Committee meeting Sept. 26 to voice her concerns.

Instead, nothing changed. She said she believed Potter dismissed her concerns.

From what Fisher had told him, Potter said she wanted to air her concerns about actions within the body at the executive meeting. Potter said Fisher was allowed to do that.

"She made a lot of 'I've heard this,' and 'I've heard this' comments," Potter said.

Potter said he was disappointed Fisher did not talk to him individually before she went to the Executive Committee meeting.

"I think she felt like she was treated rudely at exec," Potter said.

Potter said he did not know what else she wanted, but the Executive Committee listened to her concerns and asked her about them. Potter said he was surprised when Fisher announced her resignation Sept. 28.

"I still don't know her reasoning," he said. "When she addressed it on Thursday, she said there were moral or ethical concerns."

Sweat said he approached Potter again Sept. 26 after the Executive Committee and talked to him about the board.

He said Potter agreed to put Sweat back into the Senate position and appoint Kessler as one of the at-large members, removing Casey Carlson, senior in finance, as the at-large member.

"We could please everyone by putting both of us on the council," Sweat said.

However, at the Senate meeting Sept. 28, Carlson was back on the bill as the at-large member and Colin Flynn, education senator, was slated to receive the Senate position. Flynn is also a member of the SASS Committee.

"I had been made aware that Colin had experience in the Holton Hall area," Potter said, "and he's a neutral individual."

He said he thought appointing Flynn would calm some of the controversy surrounding the advisory board.

"If Kyle had come forward a week earlier, or even that Monday, I would have put him in the Senate position," Potter said. "I would still do it today."

The appointment bill with Carlson's and Flynn's names was approved.

During the open period toward the end of the meeting, Sweat tried to address the concerns over the appointment process.

Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, moved to close the Student Senate meeting to talk about ethical concerns brought up by senators about appointments made this semester.

LeDoux and several other senators left the Big 8 Room together when Henry moved for an executive session.

Bill Muir, faculty representative, said Senate could not go into executive session because the ethical concerns were about elected members of the body, and Senate would be in violation of the Kansas Open Meetings Act.

Potter ruled Henry's motion out of order.

A quorum call was taken, and it was discovered there were not enough senators left to continue the meeting. The meeting was adjourned. LeDoux and others were marked with a one-third absence because they left.

Some senators stayed around after the meeting to discuss Sweat's and other senators' concerns.

Potter said the reason this appointment was so controversial was because of LeDoux.

"The only reason this thing looks bad is because it has Trent's fingerprints all over it," Potter said.

Even though Potter said he did not mind replacing Sweat on the board, he said he would think twice about replacing an appointment without contacting the person being replaced.

Kessler is now serving on the Governmental Relations Committee, he said.

Potter said he has been very displeased with the personal attacks during debate on resolutions and bills brought before the body.

He said senators are supposed to leave grudges, personality conflicts and issues not related to Senate outside the Big 8 Room doors.

"Instead, when people clash on the Senate floor, they take it personally," Potter said.

Fisher said the debates on the floor became ugly, personal attacks as a result of changed legislation and hard feelings.

She said she wanted to argue against the process involved in making the appointments rather than against the senators chosen to fill them.

Potter said he thought some solutions to that problem had been worked out in the discussion after the Sept. 28 meeting.

"There was a great deal of turmoil in Student Senate," Potter said. "We're in the calm now."

Sweat said he and Potter worked things out at the post-Senate discussion Sept. 28.

During Senate's informal meeting, Potter said some things had happened that were not good moral decisions.

Fisher said even though problems were aired in the post-meeting discussion, she said she did not regret her decision to resign.

"A lot of people have asked me if I still would have resigned if the truth had come out sooner," Fisher said. "I told them that 'Yes, I would have.'"

Fisher said the truth coming out does not mean senators have not been lied to before or will not be lied to again about why decisions are made.

Although LeDoux refused to comment, he said he thought the problems had been addressed both Sept. 28 and over the weekend.

"The problem was in human relations," he said. "It should not be in the public eye."

idiots," she said.

Extensive education and health care for all was the solution.

"As a society, we must make health care a right to all Americans," Elders said.

The United States and South Africa are the only countries in the world with no health care system for the population, she said.

"Every criminal has the right to a lawyer, but we don't think every person should have the right to a doctor," Elders said.

Although no longer in the position of surgeon general, Elders said she plans to keep advocating the need for education and health care.

"When you aren't dealing with controversial issues, you aren't doing your job," Elders said.

"If I could do it over again, knowing everything I do now, I would do it the same way."

Several students applauded Elders' strength and ability to endure criticism.

"Why aren't you, or people like you, running for president?" several audience members asked.

Jennifer Talkington, sophomore in speech pathology and president of Students for the Right to Life, said that she took offense to Elders' comments about the Catholic church.

"I'm a woman. I'm Catholic, and I'm also the president of a right-to-life group," Talkington said. "Giving women a safer place to kill their children is not liberation, and it's not civil rights."

Talkington also asked what Elders was doing to assist in crisis pregnancies.

Elders said she trying to prevent crisis pregnancies from happening in the first place.

ROYALS EXTEND BOONE'S CONTRACT

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) – The Kansas City Royals, who finished second in the American League Central in Bob Boone's first year as manager, announced Thursday they've extended Boone's contract one year through 1997.

"Bob has provided us with very strong leadership that will help us accomplish our organizational goals," said Herk Robinson, Royals executive vice president and general manager.

Harker to return to Kansas next week

Associated Press

LAWRENCE — A K-State student who was severely beaten in an Ohio fraternity house in July may return home late next week, his father said.

Harker

Brad Harker, 20, is recovering from severe head injuries in a Columbus, Ohio, hospital. Doctors at Ohio State University Medical Center said he should be released Oct. 13, Jay Harker of Lawrence, the father, said.

Brad Harker, a K-State baseball player, was staying at the Triangle fraternity house on the Ohio State University campus while playing in a summer baseball league.

He lost four teeth in the July 16 attack, which still is being investigated.

He has been in a hospital rehabilitation facility since Sept. 22 and must continue to improve to be released by Oct. 13, his father said.

"He knows the things he's doing well and the things he needs to work on," Jay Harker said. "He's up walking totally by himself. He's walking outdoors. He's in great shape."

Brad Harker will continue outpatient treatment when he returns to Kansas, his father said.

Cats prepared for Missouri's potent running game

■ K-State determined not to relive close call of a year ago

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

K-State football coach Bill Snyder said he knows the Wildcats had a little luck on their side last year.

"We were fortunate, yes, to get away with the win," Snyder said.

The Cats' 21-18 win in Columbia was their first win at Missouri since 1985. Cornerback Chris Canty batted down a Tiger fourth-down pass in the last minute of the game to seal the victory after Mizzou had a first and goal at the Cats' 9-yard line with less than two minutes left in the contest.

Saturday's 1:10 p.m. game is the Big 8 opener for both teams and the third-straight home game for the 4-0 Wildcats.

A win Saturday will give the Cats their third-consecutive 5-0 start for the first time in school history.

The 1994 game also saw a Cat defense give up 190 rushing yards to the Tigers, 151 to Mizzou running back Brock Olivo.

"They ran the ball well against us, and we just weren't able to play it," Snyder said.

Olivo is coming off a 38-carry, 222-yard performance in Missouri's 31-22 win over Northeast Louisiana last week.

The Cats return eight defensive players from that contest, including five defensive backs.

Safety Chuck Marlowe tallied a team-high nine tackles in the 1994 contest.

But Snyder said he isn't worried about any one aspect of the Tiger team, which he said hasn't changed much in the last year.

"I don't know if there's a great deal of difference, and I'm looking on both sides of the ball," Snyder said.

The Cats return six starters on the offensive side of the ball, but none of those six contributed more than 35 yards from scrimmage in the game.

Snyder said he is impressed with the play of the Mizzou defense of late and said the squad continues to improve.

"Defensively, they've really come on and made great strides here recently," Snyder said.

The Cats are coming off a 44-0 win over Northern Illinois and back-to-back shutouts over non-conference opponents.

Aided by the two shutout efforts, the Cats' defense ranks highly, statistically, in several defensive categories.

Nationally, the Cats rank second in scoring defense, second in total defense, fourth in rushing defense and sixth in pass-efficiency defense.

But after last year's close escape in Columbia, Snyder and the Cats are not going to overlook its Big 8 opener and the 2-2 Tigers.

Snyder said the Tigers are coming around as a team.

"I think they are beginning to play very well."

▶ VOLLEYBALL

Netters look to regain momentum at Oklahoma

"We need to refocus from what happened (Wednesday) night and go down there and play hard and stay focused."

JIM MOORE
K-STATE VOLLEYBALL COACH

Shana Newell
staff writer

After Wednesday night's disappointing loss to Iowa State, the K-State volleyball team has been practicing hard for this weekend's match at Oklahoma.

Coach Jim Moore said he told the team it must regroup. Preparing for Oklahoma and forgetting about the loss to the Cyclones is crucial for the Wildcats' mental game.

"We need to refocus from what happened (Wednesday) night and go down there and play hard and stay focused," Moore said.

With a 13-3 record, the Cats will try to pick up another win against 12-5 Oklahoma. The Sooners, coming off a victory against Missouri, are 2-1 in the Big 8. K-State is now 1-1 in the Big 8 conference.

"They are a very good team," Moore said. "They were a preseason top 25 and have one very, very good hitter."

That hitter is Patrice Arrington.

Against Big 8 opponents, Arrington is hitting solidly at .288 with 30 kills and 20 digs. On the season, she is hitting .294 with 302 kills, 153 digs and 31 block assists.

K-State will counter with talented weapons of its own. Hitters Jill Dugan and Kim Zschau, blockers Debbie Miller and Kate DeClerk, setter Devon Ryning, and play-set-hitter Toie Young are part of the ammunition that Moore hopes will defeat the Sooners Saturday night.

Against the Big 8, Ryning leads the squad, hitting .364 and raking in 122 set assists and 35 digs. She is hitting .409 on the season, with 744 set assists and 118 digs.

Ryning was last week's player of the week after assisting the Cats to victories over Valparaiso and then 16th-ranked Colorado.

As K-State's only AVCA player of the week, DeClerk is hitting .284 against conference opponents. She has recorded 26 kills and 21 digs.

For the season, she is hitting .399 with 182 kills, a team high, and 142 digs. DeClerk also has nine block assists and one solo block.

Another dominant Cat is Young, who has been very productive in each of the 13 matches she's played. She is hitting at .296 for the season, a deceptive figure considering her numbers. She has 170 kills, fourth best on the team, 22 set assists and 104 digs.

Against Big 8 teams, Young has not been as productive as she has against non-conference opponents. She has hit only .258 with 41 kills and 17 digs.

Dugan is hitting .217 on the season. Against the Big 8 she is hitting better at .235. In conference play she leads the team with 41 digs and ranks third on the team with 30 kills against conference opponents. Dugan also has six block assists and one solo block.

Cats go to Big 8 Indoor Championships looking for more consistent play

Collegian Staff

School comes first, and because of that, Karina Kuregian will be hitting the books today instead of the court at the Big Eight Coaches Indoor Championships in Topeka.

Coach Steve Bietau said the decision was based on Kuregian's slow start to the season and the fact she missed so much class last week when the Wildcats traveled to the Clay Court Championships in Baltimore.

"On the Clay Courts, she wasn't really ready to play, and that's part of the issue," Bietau said.

"The other part of the issue is that we're trying to limit the amount of classes they're missing and we know she's going to the Riveria (All-American Championships) in two weeks."

Kuregian, billed as K-State's top player coming into the season, lost to teammate Yana Dorodnova in the season-opening tournament here and also lost two matches in Baltimore.

"She is definitely struggling," Bietau said. "I felt like that's begun to change this week. Her practices have begun to look better than they had for a couple of weeks."

Because this weekend's tournament doesn't add up team points, Bietau has the luxury of sitting out one of his top players.

"This is not a match where we have to play somebody because it doesn't affect the outcome of the team," Bietau said.

"If it was a dual match, it'd be a different story.

"It's in everybody's best interest for her to get some quality practice time in and then go after it at the Riveria."

"We've had good plays at times, but we haven't had sustained good play."

STEVE BIETAU
K-STATE TENNIS COACH

Of the six singles players going to Topeka, Dorodnova is the only K-State player to earn a bye in this morning's first round. The sophomore from Moscow, Russia, is the third seed in the singles draw in doubles; Dorodnova and Karen Nicholson are seeded fourth.

Nicole Lagerstrom, Chris Schulte, Dinah Watson and Lena Piliptchak close out K-State's singles lineup with Yasmine Osborn and Laura Williamson playing in the B Flight.

Bietau said he feels the dark-horse in the draw could be Watson, a sophomore from Scarborough, England.

"She won both her singles and doubles flights at our tournament, and she picked up a good win at the Clay Courts last week and got beat in a tough match against a really strong player," Bietau said. "She's playing awfully well right now."

Bietau said he'd like his team to play more consistently this weekend, something that's been lacking in both practice and game action this year.

"We just have to compete better and fight harder," Bietau said. "We've had both in our practices and in the matches so far. We've had good plays at times, but we haven't had sustained good play."

▶ EMMITT IS NO BARRY

Dear sports editor,

Normally I don't write to the newspaper, but after I saw Shane McCormick's Oct. 3 column on Emmitt Smith I had to say something.

Emmitt Smith is a very good back, but he is not even in the same class as Barry Sanders. You point out the fact that Detroit has no line, and Dallas has the best line in the NFL.

HELLO! I believe you have just proven yourself wrong. How is it that Sanders is able to have so many 100-yard games or so many 1,000-yard rushing seasons? It's called talent, Shane. With Dallas' offensive line, Emmitt should be having 200-yard games on a consistent basis.

Scott Mitchell has had one good game the past two seasons, and last weekend was it. I don't think NFL defenses are shaking in their cleats or losing sleep over Detroit's aerial attack. No, more likely they are keying in on the NFL's best running back: Barry Sanders.

'12th Night' a modern, racy romp

Kim Kircher
staff reporter

Water guns are not what you would see at a typical Shakespeare play.

But when KSU Theatre opened its production of Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" Thursday night in Nichols Theater, that's exactly what it had.

And the fact that the audience wasn't drooling all over itself and falling asleep was a plus. The cast was good at keeping the audience on its toes.

After a brief introduction, about seven loaded water guns were passed among the front-row audience members to create artificial rain during a stormy ship wreck scene.

SHOW DATES
▶ "Twelfth Night" will show at 8 p.m., Oct. 6 and 7 and 11-14. Call 532-6428 to charge by phone.

Among the few and lucky water gun recipients was Jon Wefald, who begrudgingly accepted the dubious honor and quickly turned it over to his wife, Ruth Ann.

The play soon began, and the audience was introduced to male and female identical twins, who were separated by a storm at sea.

Viola, one of the twins played by Caisha Williams, disguises herself as a man to survive in the magical land of Illyria.

Through love mingling, drunkenness, mischief and insanity, the plot thickens when Sebastian, the other twin played by Chris Ellner, shows up to cause massive confusion to his fellow characters.

Before the twins find each other and happiness, some wacky things happen.

Olivia, played by Gretchen Morgan, is wanted by every man but doesn't feel content to settle for any of them.

Orsino, the duke of Illyria, played by Toby Denning, wants her badly and will only settle for her.

This creates a slight conflict in the play, but the biggest was yet to come.

Viola becomes a servant of Orsino and is sent to highly encourage Olivia to marry the pompous and snooty duke of Illyria, who was looking for love.

The play takes a hairpin turn when the sexy and wanted Olivia falls in lust over Viola, the female disguised as a man. At the same time, Viola is ever true to her master and the man she is falling head over heels for, Orsino.

In the meantime, hilarious and crazy things said by Sir Toby Belch, the stumbling, drunken uncle of Olivia, plunged the audience into the depths of a stomach-cramping laugh session.

Belch's rude, crude behavior surpassed even the level of some of the village idiots at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon on the weekends.

Sir Toby, together with sidekick Sir Andrew Aguecheek, adds some rowdy laughter to the play.

Audiences will enjoy this racy comedy that's true to Shakespearian tradition with a dash of modern-day humor.

College football gets black eye; citizens must petition coaches to foster ethical changes

Send letters to:
Cassie

Manhattan, Kan. 66506
e-mail: collegn@ksu.ksu.edu

Dear Cassie,

I've developed a real problem with K-State. It's the political juggernaut that now has our football team. It's the control of the media, the courts and the local economy.

The investigation on the assault of two men and their dog, which occurred Aug. 20, was hushed up for weeks. The same thing happened with an assault of a local cop. But when student senators get MIPs, it's right in the paper. Hooray for thugs! They deserve special treatment.

The courts let Chad May off for a DUI. True, they did bust other players, but I know if it was me, I wouldn't have gotten off. Plus, I'm sure William Kennedy would have hated letting the Wildcats lose because of that.

I write this letter in anonymity, not because I'm scared but to avoid conflict and harassment. This is good for two reasons: If anybody comes to my house and attacks me, they'll go to jail and they'll go to the hospital if they're fortunate.

Also, I pay $1,100 a semester to learn, not deal with a bunch of dillweeds who would harass me.

I get excited when K-State wins to a somewhat-decent team; yes, football is good entertainment. And I can't blame local business owners for taking advantage of a money-making situation.

I just hate to feel that come Saturday there are 35,000 people paying good money who are allowing somebody who is cold enough to smash a dog's head with a rock to be treated better by the courts and media then, say, a professor here. That needs to change, or this school is screwed up.

The Observer

Dear Observer,

In all honesty, I have to agree with some of your points. The sad fact is that life is political, and those who know individuals in high places usually have it easier.

It is sad, but often very true. Any time money and reputations are on the line, individuals at the top will do their best to cover their asses before it gets spanked by ridicule and criticism.

I find the incident of the selective football players beating a fellow student and his dog incredibly disgusting and sick. I believe those individuals should be punished, whether it is prosecuted, kicked off the team or both.

I, too, am tired of athletes here and at other schools, such as Nebraska and Miami, doing acts of violence and getting away with it.

I was hoping that K-State would be the exception. I guess we were not so lucky.

So what can we do about it?

The only way any situation of this magnitude can be changed is for the masses to get involved.

People need to talk about it. People need to share their opinions. People need to let the suits or the coaches know that we want to keep the tradition of the Wildcats untainted from corruption of dirty politics and crimes of passion.

To the players on the team who weren't involved: Thanks for all your hard work and dedication. You make me proud! However, I challenge each of you to be strong leaders on the time and to be supportive to the men on the team, especially those who may fall to temptation and wrongdoing. As for this weekend's game — let's get ready to rumble and thrash the Tigers!

SENATE

out the amendment, SAM would only be able to get $1,200," Avila said.

Steve Weatherman, business senator, said the amendment was probably the most short-sighted and selfish amendment so far this year.

"I would be totally screwing my constituents if I voted for this amendment," Weatherman said.

He said he did not think other groups should be punished for things they had no control over.

The amendment failed.

Avila and Otto said the account needed guidelines, and Avila said guidelines would be in place by the end of the semester.

The $5,000 allocation passed by a vote of 51-2.

An allocation for two Macintosh Performa 6116 and two 14-inch color monitors for the Office of Student Activities and Services was sent back to committee after an hour of debate.

Halinski said she thought the money for the computers should come from the Office of Student Activities and Services privilege fee.

"We now have a budget that is coming into our office from the students, which we can use to fund this," she said.

The money from the OSAS privilege fee is supposed to be used for the operation and the administration of OSAS and student government.

"If these computers are necessary, then let's shift and make the money available," she said.

Tricia Nolfi, Senate adviser, said $141,000 had been taken in from the privilege fee. Since the fee was instituted after the 1995-96 budget was approved, there was an excess of $2,000 from the fee money.

Drew Wallace, business senator, proposed an amendment that would have approved the purchase of one Macintosh and one IBM compatible computer for the office to meet the needs of all students. Two Macintosh computers are already in the office.

The amendment failed.

Wallace moved to refer the bill back to the committee so more research could be done on the cost of IBM compatible computers. The motion carried by a vote of 28-22.

In first readings, Bill Muir, faculty representative, moved a resolution that would allow Senate to reconsider legislation at any time if the legislation has not been presented to the student body president.

The resolution would also delete the clause that requires people who have been appointed to committees or offices to be present at the meeting during which the appointment would be approved.

A commendation for the Chester E. Peters family was also given first readings. The names of all senators, the executive branch and the attorney general were added to the resolution as sponsors by unanimous consent.

It was unanimously moved special orders, and passed by unanimous consent.

The next item of business was a special allocation to the Chinese and Taiwanese Student Association for $258. The allocation would be $194 for a movie festival and $64 for a tennis tournament.

The final item up for first readings was a $5 special allocation to the Student for Peace and Justice for telephone and fax expenses.

In other business, Senate gained an intern and lost a senator.

Kimberly Korphage was approved by unanimous consent as a Senate intern.

Mark Wendt, education senator, turned in his resignation for personal reasons.

Graduate students trying to form union

Sara Edwards
staff writer

Small steps of progress along the path of graduate assistant unionization at K-State could begin next week.

Bruce Reid, Bridget Murphy and Kent Bausman, graduate students in sociology, are leading an effort to start a union for graduate research assistants, graduate assistants and graduate teaching assistants at K-State.

Reid said he hopes to start meeting with graduate student groups around the middle of next week, provide information about unionization and take a quick survey.

Nearby graduate students at the University of Kansas have already organized a union.

After four years, a union to promote employee interest was established at KU last April.

The union is about to start contract negotiations for health care benefits, said Dan Murtaugh, a union member at KU.

Collective bargaining power with the administration is a reason Reid, Murphy and Bausman want to form a GTA union.

"They need to be more proactive and start listening to our concerns," Reid said.

Murphy said the graduate assistants at K-State have no bargaining power.

"We want to gain a more equal situation," Murphy said.

A 3-percent raise for university faculty was requested last summer by the Kansas Board of Regents and approved by the Kansas state legislature.

However, regents universities' administrators decided against a raise for GTAs, said Marvin Burris, associate director for budget for the Kansas Board of Regents.

"Funds would have been appropriated. If the GTAs did not get a salary increase it would have been a decision made by the specific schools," he said.

Reid said he understood money was available for a graduate assistant raise, but the raise did not occur.

"I don't understand what happened," Reid said.

The union at KU filed a lawsuit concerning the 3-percent raise graduate assistants did not receive.

"This was the first time we have been singled out and denied a raise," Murtaugh said.

Reid, Murphy and Bausman do not plan to take action about the lack of a raise; instead, they are trying to collect the opinions of all campus graduate assistants.

The group wants to organize GTAs from all the colleges at K-State, but definite plans for a union have not been made yet.

"We don't have available resources to communicate with all GTAs," Bausman said.

The group has met with the Graduate Student Council in the past.

"As a council, we have to stay fairly neutral in the whole thing. I had Bruce come talk with the group so he could provide information to the rest of the campus," said Dawn Remmers, graduate student in psychology and Graduate Student Council president.

Students at KU met resistance from the Regents when they were trying to organize, Bausman said.

The administration was upset when the union used campus resources to communicate, such as E-mail and telephones, Bausman said.

"I haven't witnessed any resistance on the part of the University. We're just getting started. The idea resistance might come about is something I fear," Bausman said.

Graduate assistants need their own union because other organizations, like Faculty Senate, have been around for a while, Reid said.

However, other organizations could not represent the graduate assistant's concerns, Reid said.

"I don't understand why everyone is so concerned with going through existing organizations," he said.

John Havlin, Faculty Senate president, said he wants to sit down and talk with the graduate assistants.

"Faculty haven't discussed it as an organization. GTAs haven't come before any faculty organization to offer problems and see if there can't be a solution over and above or in lieu of unionizing," Havlin said.

Reid said he hopes the graduate students will be willing to listen to the idea of unionization.

"After all they will be making the ultimate decision. We ask everyone to make an informed decision," Reid said.

Manhattan resident wins millions

Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state's latest resident of Dream Street seemed unaffected by it all Thursday.

Manhattan orthodontist Pat Dreiling won a $31,226,251.94 Powerball jackpot.

His future? Continuing his practice.

Travel plans? A weekend trip to Durango, Colo., to visit his son.

Major purchases? A parking permit for K-State football games.

One of his first acts as a millionaire? To get an unlisted phone number.

"I feel kind of numb still," a dapperly dressed Dreiling said during a news conference at the Kansas Lottery offices. "I've had a churning stomach for the past couple of days."

Dreiling, 57, said he does not buy many lottery tickets, and he doesn't plan to buy any more.

"I'll just skip it," he said.

Dreiling became the Kansas Lottery's fifth Powerball jackpot winner on Saturday when he dashed into a Rex's Tire, a Manhattan Texaco station, to buy a pack of cigarettes on his way to the K-State-Northern Illinois game.

"I had a cold and probably shouldn't have been smoking," he said. He decided to buy the ticket when he saw a Powerball sign advertising the $31 million jackpot.

Later that night he watched the Colorado University-Oklahoma University game on television and did not pay any attention to the televised drawing.

On Monday, he still had a cold and felt sluggish, he said, and went home during the noon hour. He heard on the car radio a Kansan had won the Powerball but had not come forward.

"It went through my mind that I probably won," he said. At home he checked the numbers in the newspaper and found out that he was a millionaire.

"The first thing I did was call my accountant, but he was out to lunch," Dreiling said. "Then I called my daughters."

Later in the day, he finally got in touch with his accountant, who told him to put the ticket in a safety deposit box in a bank.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

UPC

He said UPC originally expected to sell around 2,200 to 2,500 tickets, but only 1,016 were sold. The concert actually had 1,176 people attended because many tickets were given away through radio promotions.

Carney said UPC advertised on area radio stations, through the newspapers of K-State, University of Kansas, Emporia State, Manhattan High, Wichita State and with flyers and visitations.

Postcards were mailed to all freshman and sophomore students living in residence halls, Carney said.

"We spent approximately $4,000 on publicity, more than any other concert so far," Carney said.

UPC did not advertise in the Kansas City Star or the Wichita Eagle.

Carney said when the tickets went on sale, UPC's publicity machine was not in full tilt.

It was 5 weeks before the concert that UPC's publicity did go into full swing.

The Soul Asylum tour had a stop through Kansas City the Saturday night before Monday's Manhattan concert.

Carney said the Kansas City concert only sold 1,300 tickets, and draw is from more than 1.2 million people.

When you factor in Manhattan, Topeka and Junction City, which is around 250,000, our concert performed better, he said.

UPC booked Soul Asylum in the middle to the end of summer 1995. During the summer, Soul Asylum released an album in which sales eventually went platinum, received decent critical reviews and hit the radio waves with a top-10 song.

Carney said Soul Asylum sold out RFK Stadium in Washington, D.C. this summer.

That's about 80,000 tickets. That's also on the East Coast.

What happened between this summer and this fall?

"It's unfortunate we had a tour come through Manhattan that seems to be dying," Carney said.

Carney said Soul Asylum was on the lower end of the concerts UPC was looking to bring in.

Other concerts that were available included Hootie and the Blowfish and the Cranberries.

Carney said they were ruled out because of their concerts in Kansas City.

One of UPC's goals last year was to bring in lower-priced concerts featuring bands on the verge of breaking out into the mainstream.

A group like Live, at least last year, was considered a breakout group.

Carney said this summer's concert offerings didn't include any up-and-coming groups.

"Soul Asylum was it," he said.

"You could bring in the Grifters or Elastica, but no one knows them," he said.

"Maybe the students just didn't like Soul Asylum."

"If the students don't want concerts, we won't bring concerts. If the students want one, they better support it," Carney said.

Hadley said students said they want live music, but they expect musicians like Eric Clapton, Elton John and Boyz II Men, which are financially impossible for UPC to produce.

The only way UPC could bring in bigger bands, Hadley said, is to increase ticket prices or the UPC student fee.

With the current flavor of fee-cutting, that's unlikely to happen, she said.

Carney said if UPC doesn't bring a group in, UPC is criticized, but if it do and no one attends it is criticized for disorganization and poor planning.

He said students have a voice in the issue since anyone can serve on a UPC committee like the Special Projects Committee, which sponsored the Soul Asylum concert.

Another factor Carney thinks might have played a part in the concert's failure was its Monday-night play date.

"Saturday night is better, but we coordinate when these bands want to come," he said. "Those aren't things we can control."

"Monday night probably killed us," Carney said.

Carney said he saw the Soul Asylum concert as a step in building up Manhattan's live, rock music scene.

"This concert has set us back," he said.

Carney said UPC doesn't plan to program country music acts.

"I would be extraordinarily disappointed to label Manhattan a country town," Carney said.

"To say Lawrence is the town all rock groups go to and all country acts come to Manhattan places a big stereotype on Manhattan and KSU," he said.

"Country acts draw more people from the community," he said. "We're here to program for the students. That's our first interest."

Many K-State students drive to Lawrence for their fill of music.

Carney said students need to support this town.

"We can't get students to support Wildcat events when they want to support Jayhawk events," he said.

"Those students are more a part of the problem than of the solution," he said. "I don't want Manhattan to be like KU. I want Manhattan to develop its own live music scene here."

"Students can't complain because they made the choice not to support it," Carney said.

PROTESTORS

pology, said it didn't provoke a response.

"I think that it was pretty useless. They were on the wrong side of the building, and the people coming were expecting opposition, so it didn't affect them," Hardage said.

Katrina Stenfors, junior in accounting, said the protesters acted in a responsible manner.

"I was more impressed with them and the way that they were acting compared to other protesters I have seen in the past," she said. "I have been to other speakers where they are in your face. Tonight they were here to state an opinion, not to push it on everyone else."

Chiquita Hishaw, freshman in premedicine, said the protesters were just trying to get attention.

"People went over to look at their posters, but it didn't affect the people going in. The only good thing that I can say is that at least they were not violent," she said.

REC

the Rec Complex is often used as an example of a service that would lend itself well to being a user fee because its users can be tracked.

"Only $10 is what we could actually make optional," Tomb said.

The rest of the Rec Complex fee money is tied to bonds.

Although the cost of attending the Rec Complex might increase $10 or more, membership would still be at an incredible savings compared to the real world, he said.

"Those who use the Rec would be compensating for the segment that doesn't use it at all," Tomb said.

The referendum for the Rec Complex expansion was passed in fall 1991, Robel said.

The amount students paid in fees did not increase with this bond issue because other bonds were ending and the money was redirected into the Rec Complex expansion bond.

The fee began in the fall 1992, he said. The project cost $7.9 million.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week

Policy gives opportunity to minorities

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

The employment playing field is not level, and affirmative action is still needed to level it, the director of the K-State affirmative action office said at a forum Friday.

Clyde Howard, director of affirmative action, and a group of three other panelists answered questions about affirmative action at a forum for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week in the K-State Student Union.

Affirmative action was created by an executive order by President Lyndon Johnson. The K-State affirmative action policy seeks to provide equal job opportunities and employment for women and minorities.

Howard said he did not think there would ever be a situation where affirmative action was not needed.

Dawn Anderson, an employee in the K-State affirmative action office, said of the 60 University departments heads only three are women. Of the 10 deans at K-State, only one is a woman.

Jerry Frieman, professor and former member of the affirmative action office, said that although there is still a need for affirmative action, the office's goal is to put itself out of existence.

The K-State affirmative action office is involved in all hiring done at K-State. When a position opens at the University, the department doing the hiring creates a plan to search for applicants.

The affirmative action office reviews the plan to see if enough effort is being made to ensure the University is recruiting minority and female candidates.

The office reviews the number of women and minority applicants to University jobs and the number of women and minority applicants who receive interviews and are hired.

Anderson said K-State does not have quotas. It has goals.

She said the affirmative action office looks at the number of women and minorities in a given field and compares it to the number of women and minorities who apply, are interviewed and hired to K-State jobs.

The office sets goals as to how many female and minority employees departments and the University should have.

Anderson said sexual persuasion is not a part of affirmative action, but the University has a nondiscrimination policy.

Students, faculty close Racial/Ethnic Harmony week with campus walk

More than 150 students demonstrated their support for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week Friday at the Vietnam Vetern's Memorial on campus.

Multicultural groups and greeks walked the outskirts of campus while KMKF-FM 101.5 broadcast during the final event of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

"I wanted to come out and show my support with my sorority," said Stephanie Campbell, graduate student in historic preservation and Zeta Phi Beta member.

Vivian Ferguson, junior in theater, said the people who participated in the walk supported the issues of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

"It kind of bothers me that a lot of people who need to learn about racial/ethnic harmony aren't here," Ferguson said.

Garé Davis, junior in theater, said the racial and ethnic groups of K-State were under-represented at the week's events.

Freeman Davis, an organizer for the walk and instructor in the music department, said the week was not for any particular group, and racial and ethnic harmony should not be limited to just one week.

"Everyone has to take responsibility," Davis said.

Phil Anderson, co-chair of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, said he thought the week had been successful, with the exception of faculty involvement.

"One big step that needs to be taken is to challenge deans of every college to get involved. Not to see faculty involved is like a slap in the face," Anderson said.

Davis also said the week needed a better representation of the entire campus. Deans of individual colleges should have been more involved because they have the power to give information to their college, he said.

"If we're talking racial/ethnic harmony, we need that in every college across campus. Deans play an important role in that," Davis said.

Although the walk was on Friday afternoon, the turnout was pretty good, Anderson said.

"I always like to take a walk. It was a lot of fun. It was nice to see so many different people," Anderson said.

News Digest

PULITIZER NOMINEE TO DISCUSS TERRORISM

An investigative reporter will discuss terrorism in America at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the K-State Student Union.

"Terrorism has become a rather important issue whether we like it or not," said Matt Jones, sophomore in business administration and Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee chair.

Dale Van Atta, who was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize for his investigative reporting, will talk about the news behind the headlines, specifically terrorism and how it relates to America.

Van Atta has traveled the world for the past 20 years looking for answers to the United States' problems, Jones said.

He has interviewed Russian officials, American generals, European planners and Arab leaders. He also was the first to uncover the Savings and Loan crisis and the Iran/Contra arms for hostages scandal.

Van Atta has and continues to contribute to the New York Times, Time, the Economist, Readers Digest, Washington Merry Go Round, the Far Eastern Review and others.

Van Atta will answer questions following his presentation sponsored by the UPC Issues and Ideas Committee.

PLAYER SUFFERED FROM HALLUCINATIONS

The Riley County Attorney's office has dropped all charges against K-State strong safety Chuck Marlowe in the Aug. 13 incident in which he was alleged to have assaulted a police officer.

Marlowe was not held accountable for his actions because of mental stresses brought on by heat exhaustion, assistant Riley County attorney Michael Kearns said.

"At the time of the incident, Marlowe was suffering from delirium from heat exhaustion," Kearns said. "That has been verified by medical reports we received and that we have confirmed. It was brought on by the training he went though that day."

Though the decision is similar to a temporary insanity decision, Kearns said he would not use that term.

"I wouldn't use that phrase, but it's like it. Insanity has a very negative connotation, and I don't like it. He raised his body temperature to a point where he was hallucinatory and delusionary and he didn't know what he was doing."

Marlowe, a senior from Youngstown, Ohio, is an all-America and Jim Thorpe Award candidate who leads the Wildcat secondary. His trial had been scheduled for Wednesday, Oct. 11.

▶ POPE GIVES FAREWELL SPEECH IN NEW YORK'S CENTRAL PARK

NEW YORK (AP) — Central Park was transformed into a giant open-air cathedral Saturday as Pope John Paul II celebrated Mass before a flock of 130,000, urging Americans to stand up for family life and side with the homeless, the disabled and people with AIDS.

"Do not be afraid to search for God. Then it will truly be the land of the free and the home of the brave," the pope said at the end of the service. "God bless America."

The celebration was the pope's farewell Mass in the New York region during his five-day U.S. trip, and the city the pontiff describes as "God's playground" did not disappoint.

Beneath the dramatic Manhattan skyline, where the silhouettes of tall buildings seemed to form cathedral spires rising beyond an expansive border of greenery and trees, the pope celebrated Mass on a majestic stage framed by a sea of faces.

If the pope was a speck in the park, he was bigger than life walking along Fifth Avenue after praying the rosary inside St. Patrick's Cathedral. He dispatched a waiting limousine to mingle with the people.

▶ JEWISH LEADERS GREET POPE'S VISIT WITH HEARTFELT WELCOME

NEW YORK (AP) — When Pope John Paul II visited the United States in 1987, Jewish leaders threatened to boycott a meeting with the pontiff in Miami. Now, the invitation is considered a hot item.

It's not that centuries of distrust have disappeared, but that Jewish-Vatican relations have made such big strides in recent years that no truly contentious issues are on the table.

And unlike the atmosphere eight years ago, when a Vatican audience granted to then-Austrian President Kurt Waldheim set off Jewish anger, the pope is described by some in positively glowing terms.

"He's the best friend we have in that office," said Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, senior rabbi of New York's Stephen Wise Free Synagogue and one of 24 Jewish leaders invited to the Saturday evening meeting at the Manhattan residence of Cardinal John O'Connor.

John Paul has spoken out often against anti-Semitism.

The Polish pope, who grew up about 20 miles from Auschwitz, sent a message taking up the Jewish call "never again" for the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the death camp.

And when the Vatican granted full diplomatic relations to Israel last year, yet another issue was resolved.

▶ O.J., NOT OPAL, GRABS ATTENTION

DESTIN, Fla. (AP) — Tuesday afternoon, as much of the nation came to a standstill to watch O.J. Simpson's acquittal, forecasters in the National Hurricane Center watched nervously — and unusually alone — as Opal's strength mounted.

It had been a busy year for hurricanes and a busy week for news, and the forecasters couldn't round up any reporters when Opal, idling near Mexico at the beginning of the week, strengthened far faster than the center's 100 years of records suggested it could.

"I think everybody was watching the O.J. trial," Bill Fanning said Wednesday as he, his wife and their four children fled their home in Destin. "Now, it's a panic."

If Opal didn't get any respect before its arrival, its departure left ruin and destruction that will provide reminders for years of its stunning fury.

Entire island communities were virtually destroyed. Half-million-dollar beachfront homes were obliterated. Houseboats were sunk and pleasure boats flung a half-mile inland.

▶ CEASE FIRE SET FOR TUESDAY

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — No more bombs. No more killing. Instead, the security of a father home from the war, toys and long-forgotten days at the beach.

Amid signs that Bosnia's adults may be ready to stop killing each other, its children, whether in besieged Sarajevo or down the road in Serb-held Pale, are already dreaming about peace. A new cease-fire is to begin Tuesday.

But their hope is tempered by the knowledge of what's already lost, and of their parents' version of who is to blame.

"I hope this thing, this war finishes," said 9-year-old Senad Kaliman, playing around a house's ruins near Sarajevo's main hospital.

The pallor of living inside was evident on his small face and the faces of his playmates, in hand-me-down sweaters and patched, baggy trousers.

But at least they survived. In government-held Sarajevo alone, 1,601 children have been killed, 14,944 wounded and another 40,018 displaced since the Serb siege began in April 1992. Thousands more have

Bicycle fair promotes registration

Kimberly Hefling
staff reporter

Windy, cold weather didn't deter a steady stream of students from registering their bicycles Friday at the bicycle fair outside the K-State Student Union.

More than 100 bicycles were registered during the event.

Before the fair, only about 10 to 15 percent of the estimated 1,300 bikes on campus were registered.

The fair, sponsored by the Student Governing Association and Parking Services, provided an opportunity for students to have assistance in locating the serial number necessary for registration and ask questions about bicycle regulations on campus.

Registration was free.

"It's good they're doing something like this," Chris Williams, junior in biology, said.

"I just hope they're doing it for the right reason — not so they can give me a ticket for parking or riding on the sidewalk," Williams said.

Williams said he thinks the biggest advantage of registration will go into effect if his bike is ever stolen and found by K-State Police. Because they now have his serial number, his bike would be returned if it's found on campus.

Chad Hammes, senior in accounting, said he registered his bike at the fair to avoid later hassles.

"I figured it's much easier to do it here. There's easy access today," Hammes said.

He said he hopes the University becomes aware of the number of bicycles on campus and builds more bike racks as a result of registration.

Hammes said the entire registration process took two minutes.

Russell Fortmeyer, chair of the Student Senate Parking and Campus Safety Committee, said he thinks the event helped students become more informed about bike registration.

"There have been a lot of questions asked," Fortmeyer said. "I think people are confused about what is going on with bicycle registration."

In the near future, Fortmeyer said his committee is planning to make visits to organized living groups to discuss bicycle-related issues.

Dennis Halling, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said he registered his bike at the fair because it was the most convenient time.

"Basically, I'm doing this so I don't get a ticket," Halling said.

In addition to registering their bikes, students could get questions answered from a local bicycle vender.

The Pathfinder had a bicycle display set up next to the registration booth.

"We are just here to raise a little bit of awareness about bike theft prevention," Jon Barr, Pathfinder bike mechanic, said.

Barr, junior in mechanical engineering, said he had been asked a variety of question ranging from where to find a bicycle serial number to the size of bicycle wheels.

Students will have a similar opportunity to register their bikes this Wednesday and Oct. 25 on campus.

▶ ARROWHEAD STADIUM

Chiefs' halftime show to feature KSU band tonight

Kimberly Kircher
staff reporter

The Kansas City Chiefs and the K-State Marching Band have something in common — "Monday Night Football."

The band will march onto Arrowhead Stadium's field during halftime tonight at the San Diego Chargers vs. Chiefs game. Kick-off is at 8 p.m., and the game will be broadcast on ABC.

"The Chiefs decide who gets to perform at halftime," Frank Tracz, director of the marching band, said. "It is really luck."

Tracz has accompanied the band to Arrowhead for the past three years, but never on a Monday night.

"The morning after the Chiefs' schedule came out, I was calling the stadium at a quarter to nine when the office didn't even open until nine," he said. "I was the first to call and request the date I wanted, which of course was 'Monday Night Football.'"

The Chiefs look for big bands for halftime performances, such as college or good high-school marching bands, he said.

"They run a first-class organization from how they treat the band and it's not costing us a cent," Tracz said. "They pay for the six buses and our dinner at the stadium."

The band, which has 271 members, will be spending all day to get ready to play at halftime.

The day begins with practice before the game in the Chiefs Indoor Practice Facilities to get acquainted with the field.

Playing on a professional field is different than playing on college fields, Tracz said.

"The Chiefs have grass. We have turf and their hash marks are closer together than ours," he said. "It takes some adjusting."

Following the practice, the band will eat dinner in the stadium and then go out to the field to take its seats behind the Chargers.

Walking by big-name players, who look like everyday people, in the tunnel is exciting, Tracz said.

"It is neat to see the kids' eyes get big as they walk in the stadium," he said.

The stadium is a lot tighter than at K-State, and the fans seem to be right on top of the field, Tracz said.

"The most interesting thing is to sit behind the opposing team's bench and really see what is going on, such as the colorful language and the fans screaming and throwing things behind us," he said.

"It is pretty neat to see the expressions of the band members, especially the first timers and knowing that they will be on television," Tracz said.

Before the game, the band is packed with more enthusiasm than nervousness, Marsh said.

"The band gets national exposure with the night lights and big-time professional football, and you can't buy that," Tracz said.

"Monday Night Football" is a lot more exciting because it is the only game on television and everyone is watching it, said Brent Marsh, head drum major and junior in sociology.

"Plus, it is a division game for the Chiefs, and we got the prime halftime spot of the year," he said.

But Marsh said he isn't worried about the performance.

"We are performing a show we have done before, and everyone knows it," he said. "I feel confident in what we are going to do. We are going to do a good job."

Chuck Marlowe's case merits trial by judge, jury

We are not saying Marlowe is guility. Like any other individual, we believe he should be presumed innocent until proven otherwise.

On Aug. 13, a police officer and another individual were assaulted, and property was damaged. But the primary suspect will not stand trial.

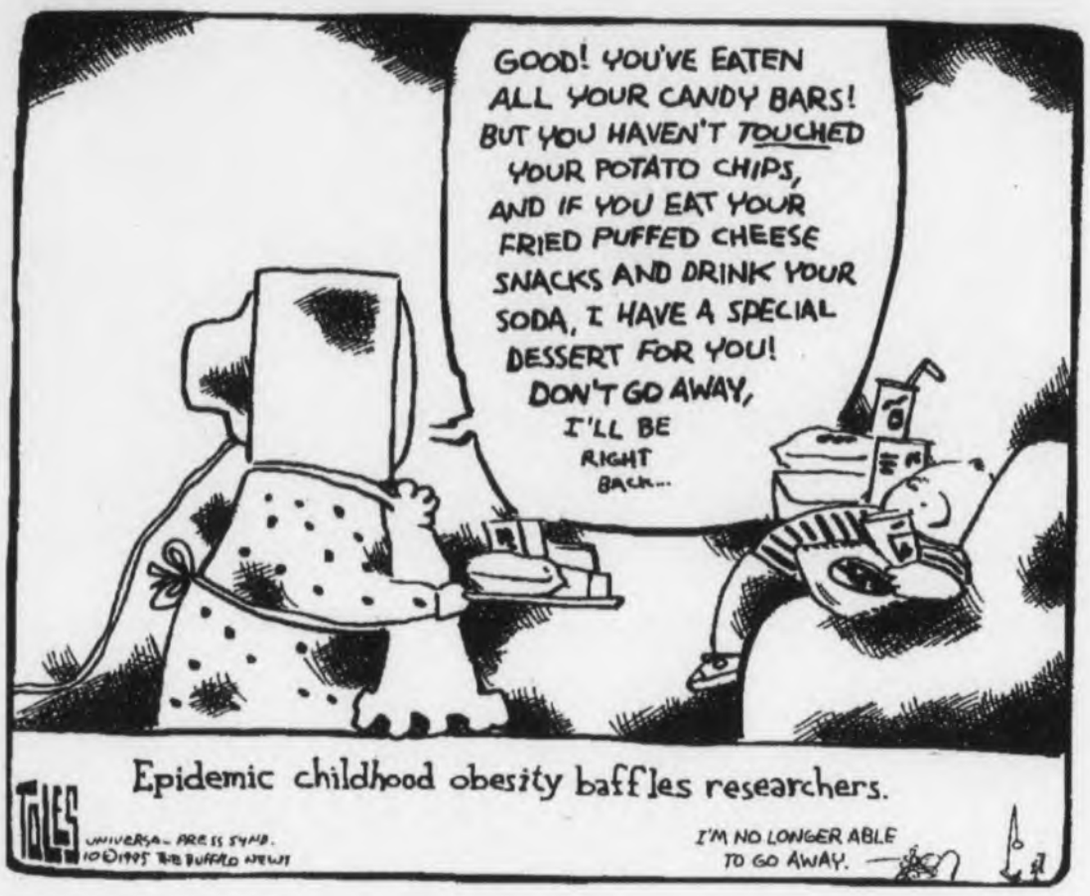
Following the incident, K-State strong safety Chuck Marlowe was charged with aggravated assault of a law-enforcement officer, aggravated battery of a law-enforcement officer, aggravated assault of an unidentified individual and criminal damage to property.

A trial date was set for Sept. 25, then postponed until Oct. 11 because the Riley County Attorney's office said they had little preparation time to argue the case.

But those arguments will not be forthcoming. Charges against Marlowe were dropped Friday because evidence suggested he might have been suffering from hallucinations brought on by heat exhaustion.

This is a valid defense. Marlowe and the team were in the midst of two-a-day practices under a sweltering Kansas sun.

But it should have been just that — a defense, an argument to be made by Marlowe's attorney to a judge and jury.



In a legal sense, Marlowe's condition closely resembled temporary insanity. The accused is asking not to be held responsible because of a temporary condition impairing his perception and judgment.

But a decision on that argument is best left for a judge and jury to decide.

We are not saying Marlowe is guilty. Like any other individual, we believe he should be presumed innocent until proven otherwise.

But when authorities have gathered enough evidence to file charges, then the accused should stand trial and let his defense be judged on its merits.

Shining light into the closet during

National Coming Out Day

"I'm not just out of the closet ... I'm in the living room with my feet propped up!"

–Queer saying

Wednesday is National Coming Out Day.

Every Oct. 11, queers across the nation take that next step out of the closet and proclaim their sexuality to somebody new.

The purpose of this day is to bring homosexuality and bisexuality out of secrecy and into the light of day.

We queers have learned through long experience that the best weapon we have to combat negative stereotypes and misconceptions is ourselves and our honesty. By exposing ourselves as queers, we make being queer that much more normal and acceptable in our culture.

There are many myths in our culture about queers — that we are strange, dangerous, sick or just plain evil. But these myths are shattered by the reality of our lives.

It is easy to dis queers when you don't know any; it becomes much harder to do so when queers are your friends, classmates, roommates, co-workers, children, parents or siblings.

COLUMN

KEVYN JACOBS

You discover what "they" say about queers isn't true about your queer loved one.

Exposure makes being queer less shocking or unusual — in essence, part of what's normal. It becomes more accepted in our culture. Studies have shown that when someone you know comes out to you, you become more supportive of queer rights.

It's easy not to care about what happens to queers when they are out there, just a faceless group of whiners.

But when discrimination happens to someone you love, it becomes personal. You see the effect of heterosexism on real human beings.

Coming out is also an empowering process, both for the queer who comes out and for closeted queers who see it happen. Those still in the closet gain role models, and learn how easy it really is to survive as an out queer.

And they also see how much healthier queers are mentally when they do expose themselves.

As any mental health professional can tell you, keeping your feelings bottled up inside is destructive.

Better to vent those feelings and deal with them than cower in hiding and let them eat you alive. We live in a heterosexist culture that day after day bombards queers with messages that we are damned and dangerous.

This is a great source of anguish to queers — it takes a great toll on the human psyche — and the human reaction to such pain is to cry out.

But being in the closet prevents you from screaming. If you are in the closet, you can't cry out about what is eating you alive — or take action to stop it.

That is one of the reasons queers keep coming out in greater and greater numbers. The more we are actively oppressed, the louder we cry out, and the more defiantly and militantly we come out.

Occasionally, a well-meaning but misguided non-queer will say, "Sure you're gay, but why must you keep talking about it?" The subtext here is that talking about being queer makes some people feel uncomfortable.

But not talking about it makes us queers even more uncomfortable. In having to choose between your discomfort and my mental health, I will choose my mental health every time.

It has been a decade now since I first came out at the age of 17. There really isn't anyone else left for me to tell.

I've already left the closet far behind, and have learned how to deal with the psychic pain our heterosexist culture inflicts on me — I have a support system with which to share my pain, and I am active in working to change the culture in my own way.

I am no longer a victim. I am a queer warrior, strong and proud.

And to you, the closeted queer K-State student reading this, this column is for you.

This National Coming Out Day, take the risk, and tell someone the truth about yourself. The life you save will be your own.

And we will gain even more strength — strength in numbers. Until the day comes when we will no longer have to fight for our lives and our sanity.

Written requests reinforce credibility with landlords

Your apartment's roof leaks every time it rains, and your landlord has not done anything about it. First, contact the landlord verbally and in writing.

Written communication adds credibility to your request and can speed up the process. Make sure to keep a copy of all written communications. Paper trails can be very beneficial if the matter has to be settled in court. Our society loves paper and lots of it.

COLUMN

SCOTT SMITH

Almost every week, I hear about a tenant complaining about a landlord not returning phone messages.

As a property manager, my schedule was busy, and phone messages were not always returned in a timely fashion. I always acted quickly if a tenant reported a problem with an apartment in writing.

A simple note describing the problem can speed up the whole process. You might include in the note the times that would be most convenient for the repair work to be done if you wish to be present while the work is being completed.

Many property managers and landlords have forms to fill out for repair work orders. Please remember your apartment is not the only property that the landlord or manager is managing.

Give the manager a few days or a week to get in touch with the tenant. Remember, students are not the easiest individuals to get in contact with. Give the landlord a chance to fix the problem.

If the landlord does not either contact the tenant or start to fix what needs to be done, the next step for the tenant may be contacting the Community Development Office of Manhattan.

The city of Manhattan will inspect the unit (an apartment or house) for possible code violations. This service is free of charge. The tenant should contact the landlord or manager before contacting the city.

Once the unit has been inspected and code violations have been found, the landlord will be required to correct the items found in violation. The tenant should be aware that the city will try to contact the landlord before the inspection.

Once the code violations have been found by city inspectors, a tenant may send the landlord a 14/30 day notice.

A 14/30 day notice is a written notice describing the items that need to be fixed or repaired to the unit. It tells the landlord the work must be started within 14 days and be completed within 30 days after the notice has been received.

If the landlord does not comply with the 14/30 day notice, the tenant can give notice to the landlord that they are moving out of the unit for failure to comply with the 14/30 day notice.

Before the tenant gives the landlord a 14/30 day notice, a code inspection should be completed on the unit in question. The code inspection report will add credibility to the tenant complaints.

Remember three things: 1) Contact the landlord or manager first. 2) Communicate all requests in writing. 3) Get help if you need it from the Community Development Office at 537-0056 and Office of Consumer and Tenant Affairs at 532-6541.

▶ BAD CONCERT CHOICE

Editor,

I would like to comment on the article about the failed Union Program Council concert.

In response to some of the comments made by Patrick Carney, UPC president — "Maybe the students just didn't like Soul Asylum." — Patrick, does the word "bingo" mean anything to you?

Carney said Soul Asylum was on the lower end of the concerts UPC was looking to bring in ... other concerts available were the Cranberries as well as Hootie and the Blowfish.

Then why the hell did you pick Soul Asylum?

Carney also said the other two bands had been ruled out because of their concerts in Kansas City, just before this the article mentioned how Soul Asylum's concert in K.C. had just flopped the Saturday before it played here.

I am personally not a big Hootie fan or Cranberries fan, but I can guarantee you even if Hootie sang with the Cranberries in place of its singer, you would have drawn a bigger crowd.

And don't even snivel and whine and blame the students.

That would be like saying,"Well, the UPC tried to do something for the students by offering free proctology exams on the Union Pedestrian Island, but Dr. Mengele didn't have a single customer, so we just can't do things for the students anymore."

Sarah Hadley said students expect musicians like Elton John, Eric Clapton and Boyz II Men.

Hello! Who are you asking for their musical opinions, my parents? I can't think of a single student I know, who didn't graduate in the '70s, who wants to see Elton John.

Calling Soul Asylum a fair representation of an alternative group is like calling Vanilla Ice a fair representation of rap music.

There are no hard-core Soul Asylum fans.

I saw a Soul Asylum fan in a movie once, "I'll be damned what they can't do with special effects these days!"

I will, however have to agree with Patrick Carney on a few things.

He said, "To say that all country bands come to Manhattan places a big stereotype on Manhattan and K-State."

He also said, "I would be extraordinarily disappointed to label Manhattan a country town."

Don't shy away from the possibility of future concerts, just make better decisions on whom to book.

▶ CARNEY DISAPPOINTS

Editor,

I am greatly disappointed in the replies given by Patrick Carney and Sarah Hadley regarding the loss of $40,000 of student money on the recent Soul Asylum concert.

First, the expected loss problem — According to your article, the concert cost $57,000 to produce.

Patrick Carney said, "UPC originally expected to sell around 2,200 to 2,500 tickets, but only 1,016 were sold."

According to my calculator, if 2,500 tickets had been sold at $18 each, the Union Program Council would only have brought in $45,000 — the UPC expected a $12,000 loss on the concert even if its optimistic expectations had been fulfilled.

It is very poor mismanagement of student money to bring in a concert that was expected to cost us money.

I am also disappointed in the carelessness with which Carney ignored what students want to hear.

He said, "I would be extraordinarily disappointed to label Manhattan a country town" and the UPC had no plans to bring in any country acts.

There are students at K-State who wish to hear country music.

To refuse to schedule acts that will appeal to more than 5 percent of the K-State student body shows Carney is using his position as president of UPC to forward his agenda of bringing alternative music to Manhattan.

Instead, I believe he and the rest of UPC should be doing their best to bring good entertainment to K-State — and bring in enough students to at least break even.

Carney also complains country acts will "draw more people from the community" and that "we're here to program for the students. That's our first interest." I contend that bringing in Soul Asylum was NOT programming for the students, at least not the majority of students.

According to the Collegian, many of the attendees were Manhattan High students.

I have no problem with their presence (their ticket purchases kept us from losing even more money).

But their presence and the lack of 95 percent of the K-State student body is a strong message that Carney is not programming for the K-State students.

I have no problem with an act like Soul Asylum coming to K-State — I believe it is good to diversify our musical scene.

It is not, though, important enough to merit $40,000 of mandatory student fee money when so many other groups need it.

I hope that this will be reflected when UPC's mandatory fee is reviewed in the future.

Carney said, "Students can't complain because they made the choice not to support it." Carney, you are wrong.

We can complain, because we didn't make the choice to bring in an act doomed to fail at K-State. With our wallets and our "Monday Night Football," we made a strong statement about what kind of music we want to hear. I hope that this message will be received by UPC when considering future acts to bring in.

One week every five years, the Tuttle Creek Outlet is closed for inspection, stopping the flow of water out of Tuttle Creek Reservoir and drying out the area commonly called the tubes.

Empty tubes

Corps of Engineers shut off Tuttle Creek outflow for five-year inspection

For the past week, the flow from the Tuttle Creek Reservoir Outlet tubes was zero cubic feet per second.

As part of a normal five-year maintenance program, the outlet gates, commonly called the tubes, were closed Wednesday, Sept. 27 to facilitate cleaning and inspection by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and then reopened Oct. 5.

Teams of engineers from Corps offices at Tuttle Creek, Kansas City and Omaha scoured the 900-foot reinforced concrete structure of the tubes and found no problems, Project Supervisor Dale Forge said.

The engineers were looking for signs of erosion and checked the seams in the concrete for movement. The inspection also included the dam, the area below the tubes, called a dissipation basin, and the rocks along the shores called rip-rap below the tubes.

The Outlet Park and the tubes are on the southwest corner of Tuttle Creek dam and are a popular spot for fishing for channel and blue catfish.

But before the inspection could begin last week, several tons of trapped fish had to be removed from a pool that formed in the dissipation basin, which is used to slow the current of the outflow.

After four pumps reduced the level of the pool to about knee-depth Monday, officials from Kansas Wildlife and Parks moved in to collect the bounty of trapped fish. With the help of a crane and a large seine, workers hauled more than 15 loads, at about 600 pounds per load, of fish out of the tubes. That's more than 9,000 pounds, or 4.5 tons, of fish.

Catfish and walleye were placed into trucks and returned to Tuttle Creek. Some smaller catfish in the 1-pound range were used to stock the public lake in Annnenberg Park for an upcoming fishing clinic for children.

All remaining fish, which included carp, gar, shad and drum, were loaded onto a flatbed truck and driven to an awaiting mob of people. Fish not returned to the lake were up for grabs for the public to sort through and take home. Those not taken were buried.

"We came out to get some carp, but this is just amazing," Louis Bracken, a resident of Allen, said. "I've seen probably seven different species of fish today."

The most common species were carp and gar, some weighing almost 20 pounds.

With all the fish removed, the Corps of Engineers, with help from private contractors, moved in to start the inspection.

Employees of PLS International of Cleveland, Ohio, prepare to take a closed-circuit TV camera into a drainage pipe that leads into the tubes. A worker was required to climb up the pipe 20 feet and guide the self-propelled camera down an adjoining pipe.

Manhattan Trenching employee Gene Feltner, Manhattan, watched as workers moved through six-foot-high columns normally covered by more than 20 feet of water.

"This is quite a deal out here. People don't realize what's under all this water," Feltner said.

The effects of shutting off the outflow were surprisingly minimal. The water level of Tuttle Creek did not not change, and the levels at Rocky Ford and the River Pond area, below the tubes, only dropped eight feet.

With the tubes again open, the discharge is only at 100 cubic feet per second.

"In fact, we're trying to raise the level of the lake for the waterfowl," Forge said.

Six-foot-high concrete blocks jut out of the concrete that forms the bottom of the tubes. This area, underwater for all but a few days every five years, is called the dissipation basin and functions as a break for the current of the outflow.

Right: Crowds gathered Monday as trapped fish that were not returned to Tuttle Creek were given away to the public. After being sorted on a flatbed truck, the fish were taken to awaiting crowds, who frantically scrambled atop the trucks to fill five gallon buckets with free fish. Fish not taken by the public were buried. Far right: Workers with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks gather trapped fish with a large seine and nets from the pool left after tubes were shut off.

Cats blank MU to open Big 8

Todd Stewart

K-State 147, opponents 0.

After Saturday's 30-0 win over Missouri, the Wildcats now have a string of 147 unanswered points and three straight shutouts.

So how does Coach Bill Snyder feel about the Big 8 season-opening victory?

"I think the University of Missouri is a good offensive football team," Snyder said. "It didn't come against an average team."

The Tiger offense came out of the blocks quickly in the first quarter. Mizzou tailback Brock Olivo burned the Wildcat defense for 43 rushing yards in the first quarter alone, while the Cats were only able to manage 32 yards of total offense in the opening period. But, to the Cats' good fortune, Tiger penalties totaling 42 yards halted Tiger drives in the first period.

The Cats' first scoring opportunity was set up by a third-down 19-yard scramble by quarterback Matt Miller. But on a first-and-10 play from the Missouri 18, Miller's pass, intended for wide receiver Kevin Lockett, was intercepted in the end zone by Tiger cornerback Shad Criss.

It was the first of two interceptions thrown on the day by Miller.

After the game, Snyder said Miller had trouble with the ball slipping from his hand.

"That's what he told me," Snyder said. "I told him that I don't want to listen to that."

Missouri, however, was unable to convert the turnover, and the Cats got the ball back on a Tiger punt.

The Cats drove the ball 67 yards in seven plays, with Miller's 24-yard strike to Lockett setting up a first-and-goal at the Tiger 8-yard line. Miller then took the ball around the right side on an option keeper and went high-stepping into the end zone almost untouched.

Snyder said even that though Miller rushed the ball 15 times in the game, don't look for him to be the leader of the team's rushing attack.

"He's not a running back by any stretch of the imagination," Snyder said. "He doesn't have the speed."

Miller said the rushing is just part of his game.

"If it's there, I take it — whatever's moving the chains," Miller said.

The Cats would not score again before halftime but would add 23 more points in the second half.

Sophomore running back Eric Hickson scored on two short runs in the third quarter, sophomore kicker Martin Gramatica added a 22-yard field goal in the fourth quarter, and senior tight end Brian Lojka finished out the scoring on a 22-yard pass from Miller with one minute, 46 seconds left in the game.

Miller said that despite the 30-0 win over Missouri, the Cats were tested.

"Anytime you start in the Big 8 conference, it's a test for us to see if we're a good ball club or not," Miller said. "And I think we're a pretty good ball club."

The 5-0 Cats opened the final season of play in the Big 8, with the team moving to the Big 12 Conference next season, which makes this season the last chance for a Big 8 title.

"It's now or never for a Big 8 championship," senior defensive end Dirk Ochs said.

Miller said the championship is the team's focus.

"Our goal is to win the Big 8 title, and that should be everyone's goal in the Big 8," Miller said. "If it's not, then they're not going to win it."

Defense earns third straight shutout

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

When some Missouri players started flapping their lips in print earlier this week, some Wildcats took notice. Especially those on defense.

"They did some talking before the game and, that motivated us," said defensive end Nyle Wiren, who had four tackles and one sack.

The defense inflicted their pain on the Missouri offense, which struggled all day and was held to 11 first downs and 118 total yards.

The Cats held Mizzou running back Brock Olivo to his lowest total of the season — 72 yards on 20 carries.

Quarterback Brandon Corso completed only 6-of-18 passes for a mere 44 yards. K-State's pass rush, which has steadily improved in each game this season, notched five sacks for 31 yards Saturday.

On eight occasions, Missouri went three plays and out, which gets the defense off the field in a hurry.

"That's our goal," defensive end Dirk Ochs said. "If we go three-and-out, that gets the offense out there, and they put points on the board."

Ochs continued his stellar play Saturday, recording three sacks and bringing his total to seven on the season, and five tackles.

"Dirk is probably playing the best he has since he's been here," K-State defensive coordinator Bobby Stoops said. "He has picked up his play."

After the offense struggled in the first half, giving K-State a slim 7-0 lead, Dirk's brother, Travis, made the big play of the third quarter.

With Missouri deep in its own territory, Travis Ochs, a redshirt freshman, intercepted a Corso pass into the flat to give K-State the ball at the 23. The Cats made it 14-0 four plays later on Eric Hickson's touchdown run.

"Basically, it was something we've been working on the last couple of weeks in practice," Travis Ochs said.

"I happened to get good pressure on the quarterback and made the play. It got the offense going and that's the best part about it. That's when they turned it on and made plays."

The play looked as if Travis Ochs and DeShawn Fogle were double-teaming the receiver, but Stoops said it was basic coverage.

"It was just a base coverage, and it's a formation that some people early in the year hurt us with," Stoops said. "We've worked to correct it and have. It was a big turning point in the game. It gave us momentum in the second half and set our offense up for a short field to score on."

Although the defense still has a long way to go to set K-State's record for consecutive shutouts, which sits at nine, they'll try for their fourth next week at Oklahoma State.

"We're in the Big 8 now, and you have to play with a lot more emotion," Wiren said.

Sooners take 2nd-straight Big 8 match from Wildcats

Shana Newell
staff writer

Do not forget about us.

That is what Coach Jim Moore asks of K-State volleyball fans after returning home from a disappointing loss in Norman this weekend.

"Even though we've lost two in a row, we don't want people to give up on us," Moore said.

Losing its second Big 8 match in a row, the Wildcats showed signs of life against Oklahoma. But hopes for a Sooner defeat were dashed when the Cats lost steam in game four.

In a four-game match, the Sooners defeated the Cats 15-5, 15-8, 9-15, 16-14. Oklahoma fell to the Cats in the third game and almost succumbed in the fourth, but were able to outlast the Cats.

"We were two hits away from being 15-2 overall and 3-0 in the Big 8," Moore said, referring to the third game of the Iowa State match and the fourth game of the Oklahoma match.

In both games, the team showed potential, pulling ahead of its opponents. But with game point and a possible win, it fell apart.

Junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk said the team has come so close to winning so many times but has not been able to produce.

"Half our problem is that we want it so much, but we can't get it," she said. "It's like we get so close, then we try too hard, and we lose. It's frustrating."

Overall, the team hit poorly against Oklahoma at only .163.

Once again, DeClerk led the team both offensively and defensively, hitting at .500. She recorded 12 kills, one service ace and 13 digs with only one error.

Senior hitter Jill Dugan also played well. She had 14 kills, but with her nine errors, she only hit .116. Dugan had one service ace and 12 digs. She led the team with two solo blocks, the only two accumulated in the match.

The poor showing of the Cats at Norman was a result of a weak attack and a high number of errors.

In the first game, the Cats only managed a total of nine kills while Oklahoma pounded off 14 en route to their first victory.

Errors were the primary cause of the Cat losses in the second and fourth games as the team was unable to return the ball across the court.

In game two, the Cats had sixteen kills, but had 12 errors. Those errors brought the team hitting average down to .093.

They fared even worse in game four, recording 12 errors but hitting only .071.

The Cats return to action Wednesday night at 7:30. They will be host to No.1-ranked Nebraska at Ahearn Field House.

Cats show well at Big 8 Coaches Indoor Championships

Rich Pefley
staff reporter

The K-State women's tennis team finished play in the Big 8 Coaches Indoor Championships in Topeka yesterday.

Sophomore Yana Dorodnova made it all the way to the finals of the singles draw before bowing out to Christie Sim of Kansas 6-2, 6-1. Dorodnova defeated Jayhawk Kris Sell 6-3, 6-2 to reach the final match.

Sim, however, was unstoppable through the entire tournament. She lost only 14 games and did not lose more than three games in any one set.

"Dorodnova had a great tournament," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "Probably the best thing was the way she fought. She had some real close calls.

"She was down 5-3 in the third against (Mary) Mahon from Colorado and was down 5-2 in the second to (Oklahoma State's Kym) Hazzard, but she fought her way through them."

Also having a good weekend for the Wildcats was junior Nikki Lagerstrom. After a tough three-set loss in the first round to Iowa State's top singles player Kirsten Fagan, Lagerstrom won three straight matches in the consolation draw before falling to Oklahoma's Angie Martin 6-3, 6-2.

"This is a very strong tournament," Bietau said. "Colorado is much stronger this year, and Nebraska is stronger. KU was the favorite last year, and they're obviously very strong.

"The overall impression that everyone had was that this was a very strong tournament. Making the finals is a pretty good accomplishment."

K-State's doubles teams also had a successful weekend in Topeka.

Two of the Cat's four teams reached the quarterfinals, and the team of Dorodnova and Karen Nicholson reached the semifinals. In that match, Dorodnova and Nicholson lost a hard-fought three-setter, 7-6, 6-2, 6-3 to Kym Hazzard and Tamsin Wainwright of Oklahoma State.

"We had a lot of people have some success in this tournament," Bietau said. "We're starting to get a pretty good idea of our doubles combos, and the team's getting more competitive.

"When you start to see players in the four-five-six range win matches in a tournament like this, it's a good sign that you're going to have pretty good depth."

The next action for the Cats comes this weekend, when they travel to California for the Rolex Regional Championships. Qualifying rounds for the regionals, the second leg of the Collegiate Grand Slam, begin on Saturday.

Sega game an instant hit with football players

They strap on their helmets and lace up their shoulder pads every day at practice.

But when K-State football players get home, they flip on their Sega Genesis for the ultimate college football experience.

Last September, Electronic Arts released College Football USA '96, and it has become an instant hit with some of the players of the K-State football team.

"We love this game," receiver Tyson Schwieger, senior in sociology, said. "We are always playing it. We really get into it. We have some serious games here at my house."

The game has all 108 Division I teams, real players, those pesky holding penalties, school fight songs and everything else that makes college football great.

But how serious do these games get?

Well, so serious that the players cannot agree who is the best at the game without having a lengthy debate.

"I'm the king," receiver Kevin Lockett, senior in accounting, said. "Nobody can even hang with me. I whip everybody I play. No one can touch me."

However, Schwieger said he is the best, no matter what Lockett says.

"Kevin is dreaming again. I usually beat him," Schwieger said. "After I beat Kevin, I won't play him for a couple of days because I like to make him sweat."

Lockett said he disagreed with Schwieger, as he tried to point out that he has only been beaten a few times on the game.

"Come on, get real here. He knows that he's only beaten me one time," Lockett said.

K-State quarterback Brian Kavanagh, senior in marketing, said he enjoys playing the game against himself. In real life, Kavanagh backs up starter Matt Miller, but on the Sega he is the star.

"The first thing that I do when I play with K-State is put myself in at quarterback," Kavanagh said. "I'm not the quickest quarterback there is, but I've got the arm. When I play, I just sit back and throw the ball every time."

Both Lockett and Schwieger said they are tempted to try to get the ball to themselves when playing with

▶ UNION FOOD SERVICE

Enhancement waiting on decision

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

The new director of the K-State Student Union said he will be making a decision about the fate of Union Food Service by next Thursday.

At the Union Governing Board meeting Thursday night, Bernard Pitts, the new Union director, said the progress of Union enhancement is at a standstill until a decision is made about the future of Food Service.

"There is an urgency to this decision," Pitts said. "The architects need to know what direction we are going to take."

Pitts, who has been at K-State less than a week, said he is supposed to have a recommendation to Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, by 5 p.m. Thursday.

The Union is examining several options, including branding, contracting out for food service, keeping the present in-house food service or using a combination of all three.

Branding would mean bringing in outside food vendors. Subway in the Union is an example of branding.

If the Union decided to eliminate in-house food service, $1.5 million of the enhancement money would be able to be used for other projects. The Union would only have to provide outside companies with space.

"We would just say, 'Here are the four walls. You do what you want with it,'" Meredith Mein, UGB president, said.

Sarah Hadley, acting Union Program Council director, said branding could be a problem if students' tastes change.

"You bring these companies in, and they are great for a year or two," she said, "and then students' tastes change again, but you are stuck with a contract."

Pitts said food-service companies usually sign 10-year contracts.

Patrick Carney, student member of UGB, said Union Food Service is losing money and the Union should go with a plan that will be profitable.

"When students voted on the renovation, it was with the idea that the Union would change so it could operate in the black," he said. "We need to bring in something that will be profitable to the college, students and the Union."

The University hired a consultant to help examine the Union's food service options.

The consultants have issued several draft reports, but Jack Sills, senior associate Union director, said the reports have not given much insight on what direction the Union should take.

Pitts said he thought the Union might decide on a plan that would include all three options.

He said this could allow the Union to serve all of its customers adequately.

COMMITTEES

▶ If you would like to be a member of a K-State Student Union enhancement committee, go to the Union director's office on the second floor of the Union, or call 532-6591.

Carney said he just wanted something better than the Union has now.

"The Stateroom reminds me of my high-school cafeteria," he said. "I didn't like eating in my high-school cafeteria."

In other business, Pitts asked the board if it would consider allowing tobacco sales in the Union again.

"All potential revenue streams should be considered," he said.

The Union stopped selling tobacco and banned smoking in spring 1991.

As plans are being made for enhancement, he also said creating a smoking area should be considered.

"The Student Union is for students. We don't differentiate between smokers and non-smokers," he said.

The tobacco issue will be on the board's agenda next week. It will meet at 5 p.m. Thursday in the Union director's conference room.

College Bowl competion tests students' knowledge

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Students' opportunity to test their knowledge against others is just around the corner.

The first informational meeting for College Bowl '95 will be at 7 tonight in Union 209.

"College Bowl is actually a national program that colleges and universities all over the United States participate in," said Tim Henderson, program adviser for the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

College Bowl is played by two teams. There are four to five students on each who answer questions on a variety of topics by buzzing in before the other team does, Henderson said.

History, literature, science, multiculturalism, religion, geography, current events, the arts, social sciences, sports and popular culture are some of the topics.

"College Bowl was created in 1953. It has been televised and broadcasted on the radio in the past," Henderson said. "It won an education achievement Emmy for the televised version. It has also been recognized by every president since Eisenhower."

Bruce Kinney, sophomore in marketing, and Chris Limbird, senior in physics and electrical engineering, competed on different teams in College Bowl last year.

Kinney said College Bowl can be compared to "Jeopardy."

"It's sort of like 'Jeopardy,' except you don't have to answer in the form of a question," he said.

Limbird said his experience with academic quiz bowl in high school influenced him to try College Bowl.

"Some of my friends and I got together. We all played Trivial Pursuit and threw stupid trivia stuff around to each other," Limbird said. "We were all on academic quiz bowl in high school. We saw the posters and decided to do it."

Neither Kinney nor Limbird's team prepared much for the competition, they said.

"You basically have to memorize the encyclopedia to prepare. We kind of went in cold and didn't prepare," Kinney said.

"It was pretty fun, but we didn't do too well," he said.

Limbird said the event was fun, but his team did not win either. He said there were a lot more current events and headline questions than he expected.

Limbird said he is considering competing again this year if he can find the time.

"If I do compete again, I will know more about what is going on. I will actually prepare somewhat and read the paper more," he said.

Another informational meeting for College Bowl '95 is scheduled at 7 p.m. Oct. 23, in Union 205.

College Bowl '95 is Nov. 11-12 at the Union.

Student teams can pay a $25 entrance fee and register for the event Oct. 10 in the UPC office.

Jesus Christ SUPERSTAR

■ Audience lured into Webber's satirical interpretation of the last days of Jesus Christ

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

Red lips kissed and hissed. Seductive lace graced the stage.

And three demons lured Judas Iscariot and an unknowing audience into Andrew Lloyd Webber's twisted plot of "Jesus Christ Superstar" Friday night.

Webber used the evils of modern day society and a uniquely personal, satirical twist to tell the tale of the last seven days of Jesus' life.

The performance was scarred by one flaw Webber and Tim Rice, the lyricist, should have expected — no man, not even Ted Neeley, can perform the historical role of Jesus Christ.

Neeley, who starred in Norman Jewison's controversial motion picture "Jesus Christ Superstar," portrayed Jesus from his human perspective,instead of delving into the biblical characteristics described in the gospels.

The storyline, based on the Bible, interpreted the actions and final agonies of Jesus in a human way.

Neeley's Jesus seemed self-righteous and cocky during his days of ministering.

In contrast, the Bible portrays Jesus as a peaceful, righteous person who was sure of himself because he was with God and was God.

Flaws of Neeley's character included omissions of vital parts of Jesus' character.

Jesus did not pray or talk to his Father, God, during the first half of the production. In the Bible, Jesus kept in constant communication with God.

The lack of that important key caused an imbalance of Jesus' character, which showed in his interaction with Mary Magdalene.

The role of Mary Magdalene is minimal in the Bible, but Webber chose to exploit her presence to incidences the Bible fails to mention.

Instead of leaning on his Father for comfort, Webber and Rice's Jesus leaned on Mary Magdalene. This is a crucially inaccurate portrayal of Jesus, according to the Bible.

The play's authors tried desperately to portray a God that is nearly impossible to fathom, and they succeeded only in giving Jesus more human qualities than Godly.

Webber and Rice did succeed in portraying Judas Iscariot accurately. Much applause can be given to the excellent performance of the understudy, and his three demonic sidekicks.

Throughout the entire production, their performance was consistent and accurate. The demons lurked over Judas, increasing his anxiety and leading him in Satan's ways. Webber and Rice hit this on the spot.

Caiaphas, by Christopher P. Carey, was simply excellent in voice. His deep bass boomed throughout the Auditorium and brought the audience to a standing ovation at the end. The Judas Company's luck in casting Carey is phenomenal.

But many of the voices were excellent, rich and seductive. And Webber's brilliant score carried the plot on the hinges of angels wings.

The music took different forms to lighten the mood, add climax and darken the characters.

Unfortunately, the music carried a translation of the characters more than the plot.

A few amateurs also graced the stage Friday night.

The choreography was excellent, but a few of the dancers were sloppy. Top-heavy, awkward and offbeat, a few of the women needed a few more practices.

The Judas Company also chose to translate King Herod as Elvis, snazzing up the performance with a little glitter and a lot of much hip swinging. The scene begs the question — was that appropriate? Finally, the play ended when the story didn't.

Unfortunately, Jesus Christ Superstar ended with his death on the cross, when the most superhuman event of Jesus' life was his resurrection of the dead, according to the Bible.

The production was energized and thought-provoking, but Webber and Rice took on a task they could not handle.

Live music alive at Derby

Heidi Evert
staff reporter

Despite the cold, two local bands and their groupies jammed under the stars outside the Derby Complex Friday night.

The Hall Governing Board sponsored The Invisibles and Ten Thumb to provide entertainment for people in the residence halls and anyone else who wanted to come.

"There's nothing like free entertainment," James Hansen, Manhattan resident, said.

An audience of about 50 people surrounded the bands, which were playing on the basketball court, sans stage.

Nathan Parr, sophomore in theater, was one of the faces in the crowd milling about the court.

"I think they're two really good bands. They have two different styles. The Invisibles seem to play a little wilder, a little more crazy when they're playing," Parr said. "Ten Thumb plays really good, really complex songs. They are fun to listen to."

The Invisibles have been together since December '94.

"We're as local as you can get," Derek Macy, guitar player, said.

"Yeah man, we're as loud as you can get too," bassist Bill Hughes said with a broad smile.

Lead singer Ralph Reichert has a different approach to describing the music that the band members make together.

"Our music sounds like drunk rock 'n' roll with a touch of tenderness not seen since the age of Neil Diamond's youth," Reichert said.

The Invisibles occasionally peruse the local bars, making fans and creating mischief.

"A lot of the bars don't like us because we tend to scare everyone," Hughes said. "The downfall for music in this town is because none of the bars will give any of the bands press when they're playing."

Drummer Kendric Beachey said Manhattan's underground local bands deserve more recognition for their talents.

"If the Collegian people think that the live music scene in Manhattan is dead because there's no more Soul Asylum concerts, then they should probably just check out some bands from around here," Beachey said. "There's a lot of good talent that doesn't get seen."

Not everyone in Manhattan is apathetic to live music, just as not everyone in Lawrence is snobbish. Both are generalizations, Ten Thumb vocalist Marty Robertson said.

"The people in this town are more conservative, and it is more of an ag town and not as big on arts and culture, which is fine," he said.

"If people want to come to our show and buy our CD, it's their option. We're not going to bitch about it," he said.

The band plans to have an album of original music for sale sometime next year.

And with the introduction of new guitarist Jon Evans, the band's aura has changed, prompting the quest for a new name.

"We got stuck with Ten Thumb because we couldn't find anything different," Robertson said.

"We just figured when Jon joined the band, we'd think of something different."

Lecture to discuss future of communities

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

Creating community sustainability today is the key to tomorrow's future.

Richard Conlin, member of the Sustainable Seattle management team, will present "Living Today as if Tomorrow Matters: Ways to Create Community Sustainability" at 7:30 tonight in Union Forum Hall.

"We need to start thinking about long-term questions," said Christopher Cokinos, instructor in English and vice president of the Northern Flint Hills Audubon Society.

Conlin, director of the Community and Environment Project for Metrocenter YMCA in Seattle, works to reduce home environment pollution and educate people about sustainability through Sustainable Seattle.

He also directs the Seattle YMCA Earth Service Corps, which is a youth leadership program focused on the environment.

Conlin's presentation will offer a holistic view of community sustainability, said Robert Wilson, graduate student in regional and community planning and president of Students for Sustainability.

"The concept of sustainable communities addresses the long-term cultural, economical and environmental vitality of a community," he said.

Sustainability is meeting the needs of today without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their needs, Wilson said.

"It essentially means looking at different elements of community life," Cokinos said.

Some of those elements are demographic data, literacy rates, water quality and economic diversity.

"Communities play a major role in solving socio-economical and environmental problems," Wilson said.

All types and sizes of communities can look at sustainability, which includes the K-State campus and especially Manhattan, Wilson said.

"K-State very much has a role to play in developing a sustainable community for Manhattan," Wilson said.

The lecture is co-sponsored by Students for Sustainability and the Northern Flint Hills Audubon Society.

Celtic artist casts spell on audience

Page Getz
contributing writer

The Manhattan Arts Center was a full house Saturday night with the breathtaking presentation of Celtic folk performer Connie Dover.

Dover, an acclaimed vocalist often compared to Enya and Clannad, held the audience of about 150 in mesmerizing solace. Dover's almost hypnotic voice created an endearing calm through most of the Irish and Scottish ballads, reels and jigs.

Accompanied by Roger Landes on bouzouki and guitar, the authentic medieval songs were both intimate and melancholy.

The jigs were playful and ironic with a sarcastic charm in songs like the politically correct revision of a parody Dover calls "Women Are Better Than Men."

Available on the Taylor Park Music record label are Dover's internationally recognized solo albums "Somebody," released in 1991, and "The Wishing Well," released in 1994.

WHAT'S NEXT:
▶ Folk/Blues artist Katy Moffatt is next up for the Birdhouse fall acoustic music series. Watch the Collegian for more information.

Dover is one of four female musicians featured on a new CD titled "Celtic Voices," released on Narada Records.

The show was organized by Birdhouse Productions, a local group committed to the promotion and sustenance of local folk and acoustic music.

David Kamerer, founder of Birdhouse, said the organization's first goal is to bring good acoustic music to Manhattan.

"The important thing is not to lose $40,000 dollars," said Kamerer, assistant professor in the school of journalism and mass communications.

"The Internet is a good way of tracking artists. We find out who's already touring in the area to keep the cost down and coordinate when the art center is going to be available."

"Our motto is 'It's nice to drive to Lawrence to see a show, but you shouldn't have to,'" Kamerer said.

Dover said she was impressed by the presence of a facility like the Manhattan Arts Center in such a small community.

"There's a lot happening here," Dover said. "There has to be a real interest here for Manhattan to have had Boy of the Lough, one of the premiere Celtic bands in the world last year," she said.

Mitchell Strauss, a self-described elf helper at Birdhouse, said the organization will help to promote eclectic arts in the Manhattan area.

"It's a unique listening venue," said Strauss, professor in the department of clothing textiles and interior design. "Manhattan is beginning to get a reputation for being a hot spot for acoustic music."

Habitat for Humanity and First Savings Bank will sponsor a benefit Dec. 2. The show will feature Nashville-based Tom Kimmel and Maryland-based Tom Prasada-Rao.

Kassebaum rallies for job training bill

■ Under bill, states would be responsible for job training

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum used one of the Clinton administration's own slogans in trying to gain the support of Labor Secretary Robert Reich for her bill to turn job training programs over to the states.

"I said, 'You're the ones who wanted to reinvent government. Here's a chance to do it,'" Kassebaum, R-Kan., recalled in an interview. "I think we've taken a lot of steps in the negotiations but we can't go too much further."

The Senate is scheduled to begin debate and possibly vote Tuesday on the measure, which would combine 91 federal job training programs and $7 billion in annual funding into a single block grant for the states.

The bill seeks to integrate education and training programs at state-run, one-stop job centers that would offer a wide range of services in a single place.

The federal government withholds up to 10 percent of a state's block grant if it fails to reach certain performance standards.

"I feel strongly that we have not done that good a job here in Washington," Kassebaum said. "The states know best."

The legislation was initially made part of the welfare reform bill passed last month by the Senate, but it was removed before the final vote. Kassebaum, who chairs the Labor and Human Resources Committee, wanted the bill considered on its own merits.

The most vocal opponent is Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., whose brother-in-law, Sargent Shriver, helped launch the Job Corps three decades ago.

The Job Corps runs 110 centers around the country that provide training and education to 60,000 underprivileged young people each year.

Kennedy plans to offer an amendment to keep the Job Corps at the federal level. Another Kennedy amendment will try to do the same for a program that assists workers who lose their jobs because of international trade agreements.

"I'm concerned that the pending bill drastically curtails two proven programs," Kennedy said. "It makes no sense to trash programs that work."

Opponents have on their side the private contractors who operate Job Corps centers, many of whom like the system just the way it is. Kassebaum's bill also would close 25 of the worst-performing centers.

Other groups oppose turning over to states the programs that train older workers.

"The more we split them up into their own little niche, the more we miss an opportunity to make the best use of the dollars available," Kassebaum said. "They'll make their appeal to the state legislatures."

Kassebaum's approach differs markedly from the job training bill passed last month by the House, which would create a system of vouchers people could use to pay for training and education, including college. The House bill converts federal programs into four block grants.

So far, the Clinton administration has signaled greater support for the House bill while hinting at a possible veto if the Senate version eventually emerges as the final product. Differences in the two bills would have to be settled in a House-Senate conference committee.

▶ OZARK COMPETITION

Pumpkin farmer wins prize, shoots for a 700 pounder, appearance on Letterman

Associated Press

REPUBLIC, Mo. — Don't try challenging a die-hard Texan to friendly competition, Audie Starkey said.

Before you know it, he could become a pumpkin expert, a card-carrying member of the World Pumpkin Confederation and the grower of a 500-plus-pound orange beauty.

At least that's how it happened for Starkey, a retired coal miner. He couldn't sit back and hear an Oklahoma couple talk about growing huge pumpkins without seeing how he and the Texas soil could do.

More than 2,000 Ozarkers saw his finished produce Saturday at Republic's Pumpkin Daze. They saw Starkey and his 522.8-pound pumpkin win top prize at the weigh off — second place was a mere 404 pounds.

Among other colossal produce presented Saturday was a 125-pound watermelon and a 6-1/2-foot gourd. Spectators came from across the Ozarks, and competitors were drawn from throughout the region.

Sure, Starkey was proud to win Republic's contest; it's one of the bigger competitions. Besides, who wouldn't be proud when more than 100 people walk by and touch your pumpkin to make sure it's real?

But the 45-year-old from Mt. Pleasant, Texas, said he knows he can do better.

"I wanted a 700-pounder — not many people run in that club," Starkey said. "And that's where I'm going. I'm going to shoot the moon next year."

He's headed for the 700 club after only two years of growing pumpkins. This year he used seeds from a 725-pound pumpkin; next year he'll be planting seeds from a 836-pounder.

Starkey, with a firm handshake and a sense of humor just as strong, knows just about anything you want to know about pumpkins. He knows by experimenting in his backyard garden, talking with other growers or reading hints from his pumpkin newsletter.

He said he admits many people still don't take him seriously.

"Everybody in east Texas is laughing at me, but that's OK," he said.

They're laughing at Republic's new pumpkin-growing king — a man who hopes to land himself and his fruit on the "Late Show with David Letterman."

After presentations at festivals, nursing homes and elementary schools in October, Starkey has big plans for November. He's making a pitch for Letterman to drop his pumpkin from 100 to 150 feet high. Letterman occasionally drops anything from watermelons to televisions out of windows several stories high.

The title of the segment, Starkey said, could be "The quickest way to get seeds out of a 500-pound pumpkin."

Joe Kelley, of Republic, said he thinks Starkey has a chance. Kelley holds the state record for the largest pumpkin grown in Missouri. It was 462-1/2 pounds. He was Republic's first winner at the debut Pumpkin Daze in 1992.

Letterman's staff called Kelley last year to be on the show and he declined. He's hoping for Starkey this year.

"He's a real nice guy with a real nice pumpkin," Kelley said.

And despite what everybody thinks, there's no real secret to growing a big pumpkin, Kelley and Starkey agree. It just takes a lot of luck, a good seed and a seven-day-a-week commitment.

"You can't write a recipe to do it like you're making a cake or something," Starkey said.

Colleges lure potential students with gimmicks

Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Concordia College spokesman Tim Ohlman remembers when colleges turned away prospective students in the 1970s.

Times have changed, and colleges now are scrambling to lure students to campus.

"All of us are looking for things that will jump out of your mailbox," said Lisa Schmidt, admissions director for the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

In the 70s, there were about 3 million high-school graduates each year for colleges.

The number has dipped to about 2.5 million, the Omaha World-Herald reported Sunday.

From videos to colorful brochures and personal meetings, colleges are trying to maintain enrollments any way they can. Buena Vista College in Storm Lake, Iowa, has mailed cardboard tubes of information and kaleidoscopes.

One of the keys, college recruiters and students said, is the assurance of adequate financial aid and personal attention. Buena Vista spokeswoman Susan Cameron said tube mailings didn't generate as many inquiriess as expected.

"What we've found recently is that it's really the traditional approach that gets through to the student — the interpersonal connection," Cameron said.

Dick Lundquist, a guidance and testing director for District 66 schools in Omaha, said Nebraska also must offer its prep students reasons to stay in-state.

He cited a state scholarship program that guarantees $2,000 to Missouri high-school graduates who meet certain college-entrance test scores, graduate high in their class and attend a Missouri college.

Nebraska needs a program like that, Lundquist said.

"We're getting out-recruited by other states," he said. "We're getting our pocket picked, if you will."

Wichita curfew ordinance fails to hold parents responsible

Associated Press

WICHITA — When the Wichita City Council passed a new ordinance establishing a curfew for anyone 17 and under, the idea was to make parents more responsible for their children.

But since its enactment in June of last year, the ordinance has resulted in thousands of tickets issued to young people, and less than 20 cases have been filed against parents.

"We've set up a system where we can legitimately prosecute people, and we've done that, but we haven't done a lot of it," Assistant City Attorney Doug Moshier said.

The law requires parents to pay fines if their children repeatedly break the curfew. Prosecutors must send the parents of a ticketed youth a certified letter — not an easy task when young people routinely give officers false information.

"Kids can lie easily, and many of them say they live with an aunt, a grandparent," Moshier said.

To comply with the curfew ordinance, anyone up to age 16 must be home by 11 p.m. on weeknights and by midnight on Friday and Saturday.

For 16- and 17-year-olds, curfew is midnight during the week and 1 a.m. on Saturday and Sunday.

After the first ticket is issued, parents receive a letter warning that their child was ticketed for breaking the local curfew.

On a second violation, parents are subject to a fine of $50 to $500. After the third violation, they are fined $100 to $500.

A group of business owners, city officials, parents, students and school administrators recommended looking for a remedy to some of the noise, underage drinking and violence plaguing a well-known teen cruise strip.

"There was agreement that this was needed to help parents control their children," Moshier said.

"And to that extent, it's happening."

But is it? For the first 15 months since the ordinance was enacted, 2,863 tickets were issued. On average, 190 tickets a month had been issued through the end of August.

Many of those — 18 percent last year and 37 percent this year — were second or third tickets issued to the same youngsters.

Yet, in 1994, the municipal court heard only 11 curfew violation cases against parents. So far this year, the number is just eight.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Pope concludes U.S. visit

Associated Press

BALTIMORE — Preaching in the cradle of U.S. Catholicism, Pope John Paul II urged the faithful Sunday to heed America's founding fathers and bring religious convictions to bear on political issues.

On the final day of his fourth U.S. pilgrimage, the pope celebrated Mass from an altar in centerfield, the location 100 years ago of a saloon run by Babe Ruth's father.

"Every generation of Americans needs to know that freedom consists not in doing what we like, but in having the right to do what we ought," John Paul said, warning of the dangers of a permissive society lacking a moral foundation.

On a sunny autumn day, the scoreboard at Oriole Park displayed the message, "He is here," as the rock group Boyz II Men serenaded the pontiff touring the baseball stadium in his popemobile. The stadium had not rocked to such cheers since Cal Ripken broke Lou Gehrig's 56-year-old record of playing in 2,130 straight games.

"This is No. 1," Walter Gentile, an Orioles usher, said. Ripken's record-breaking game last month? "That's No. 2."

Three hundred gospel singers waving yellow and white Vatican flags sang the spiritual "I Want to be Ready When Jesus Comes," as the popemobile rounded the infield.

Later, the popemobile took John Paul in a parade through downtown. He then joined 19 people in a soup kitchen for a lunch of chicken and rice casserole, peas, carrots and chocolate chip cookies.

"I'm enjoying myself. I wish it would go on all week," said Alphonso Alvarez, a regular at Our Daily Bread, which is run by the Catholic Church.

John Paul bent down and kissed the foreheads of six children at the center.

Also on his schedule was a meeting with Vice President Al Gore before boarding his TWA plane for Rome.

John Paul delivered his stadium message in America's oldest Catholic diocese, one established by English Catholics fleeing persecution who established the colony of Maryland.

The message was clearly aimed at pushing Roman Catholics to raise their voices in the public policy debate and promote what the church holds as the moral truths.

"Can the biblical wisdom which played such a formative part in the very founding of your country be excluded from that debate?" John Paul asked.

"Would not doing so mean that America's founding documents no longer have any defining content, but are only the formal dressing of changing opinion? Would not doing so mean that tens of millions of Americans could no longer offer the contribution of their deepest convictions in the formation of policy?"

After a especially busy schedule in New York on Saturday, John Paul appeared less vigorous than he had during Mass in Central Park. He seemed to slouch in fatigue in his green vestments while sitting at the altar, which was set up at the 410-foot mark in deep centerfield.

In a week, the 75-year-old pontiff will begin the 18th year of his papacy, the second longest this century, behind Pius XII.

The crowd began arriving before dawn, growing to 50,000 for the Mass that took on the aura of a World Series. Placards spelling out "Welcome" and flashing the papal emblem were held up by hundreds of swaying young people.

The pope's words were in line with earlier themes on his trip, imploring Catholics to remain strong against abortion, euthanasia, pornography and a self-indulgent culture.

The pope flew in from Newark's airport, where security was so tight that Secret Service agents inspected under the hoods of all vehicles including New Jersey State Police cars.

Among those paying farewell to the pope at the airport was police officer Ward Foggin, whose 2-year-old daughter, Caitlin, was blessed by the pontiff.

"We've been waiting for the pope's visit for the last two years," said Foggin, holding his neurologically impaired daughter.

"I feel so holy. We're on sacred ground right now on Newark Airport."

Hurricane forces Florida town to rebuild

Associated Press

MEXICO BEACH, Fla. — The city streets department won't get a new pickup truck this year, nor the police chief a fifth officer, nor the mayor the new sewer system he's worked and waited for.

The money will go instead to recover the losses of Hurricane Opal.

And there are hundreds of other ways this little town will adjust and rebuild after the big storm.

State police help a woman dig in the sand behind her broken house for missing jewelry. A convenience store reopens and offers hot coffee and a chat. Someone supplies ice, a sledgehammer and a shoulder to cry on.

"We're not used to taking care of problems like this," Mayor Gary Gaddis said. "We get a lot of hurricanes, but most of them just blow a little bit and we get some minor damage."

Not this time.

Rental trucks backed up to damaged homes, where brigades of friends passed out salvaged belongings. Bulldozers shoved debris into piles or filled sand gaps in the beach.

The mayor couldn't keep count of all the relief coming in. He was personally grateful to the folks at a Salvation Army van, where he's received hot meals.

The swirling wind of Opal about 40 miles out from the eye pushed a giant surge of seawater against Mexico Beach, crumpling dozens of modest houses along the gulf.

For many in this middle-class town of 1,200, homes represented their life's earnings.

Police Chief Jeff Sellers recalled one man who angrily protested as officers evacuated him from his collapsing house at the height of the storm. He apologized two days later, Sellers said.

Carrie Stomp, who with friends was clearing debris from her wrecked restaurant, said the work helped her emotionally.

When she first saw the torn-away walls, the walk-in coolers washed out by the waves and the chaos, she said she went into hysterics. But soon she was getting materials to shore up a deck. Next, her gang would go after the dining room's two-foot high drifts of seaweed and muck.

Stomp laughed when a friend pointed to the lobster tank, flushed out by the storm.

"You've got to make jokes," she said. "I'm just praying they'll let me rebuild."

Bay County building inspectors trudged the length of the beach taking an inventory of damage so the next phase of recovery — demolition or rebuilding — can go forward.

Of 125 or so homes they checked, about 30 were beyond repair. Some owners were resigned.

"They knew what they had," inspector Dave Evans said.

For homeowners like Celia and Guy Cochran, there was less certainty. The waves slashed away the back of their home; the now-calm gulf reflected in a mirror on an exposed living room wall as they gathered up furniture.

Returning was painful, but, if allowed, they would rebuild on the same spot, facing the red sunset.

"I felt like I was coming to a funeral," Celia Cochran said.

Harriet Cooper stopped by the buzzing town hall Saturday to thank city crews.

"I'll tell you, I could have kissed them when they came over there and got that water on for me," she said.

The contractor who built her house dropped by to make sure it was structurally sound; a plumber friend, also unasked, checked the pipes. Small town ways, she shrugged, smiling.

But small towns have small budgets, too.

Since the storm, the city council meets daily at 8 a.m., and one of its first decisions was to freeze all discretionary spending in the $1.2 million budget. No new truck for the water department. No extra police officer.

A project the mayor held dear — construction of an $8 million sewer system to replace the town's septic tanks, many of which were swept away — will also have to wait.

Repaying borrowed federal and state money was barely feasible before the storm, but Opal upset the delicate equation. Besides facing recovery costs, Gaddis said, the town may lose population, which would raise per-customer sewer costs too high.

"It appears that in one sweep, overnight, that's been destroyed," he said.

Still, looking for gain within the loss, he found the spirit the recovery effort brought out.

"The community," he said, "will be a better place when this is all over with."

Danielle Dempsey-Swopes, an affirmative action office employee, said the difference between goals and quotas is that there are repercussions if quotas are not met and there are no repercussions if goals are not met.

Quotas can be set by courts if it is determined a company or institution has shown a history of discrimination and has not made acceptable advances in hiring women and minorities.

Frieman said the goal of affirmative action is to create opportunities for qualified minority and female applicants. Hiring is still made on the basis of who is most qualified, but most qualified is sometimes hard to define, he said.

He said subjective decisions are made as to what weight should be given to different aspects of someone's qualifications: letters of recommendations, publications, experience, etc.

"We have to ask what weight should be given to diversity," Frieman said. "Diversity, like any other aspect, should not be given zero weight, and it should not be given the most weight.

"It is hard to measure. If we could put it all in an equation, then we won't have to make a decision."

The University made advances in hiring Hispanic and Native American faculty last year but not African American teachers, Anderson said.

Howard said one thing the office does to help increase affirmative action hiring is increasing the applicant pool. He said the office shows departments other resources they can use to increase the number of minority and female applicants.

Howard said another important aspect in increasing opportunities for women and minorities is changing people's minds.

"Organizations will change when individuals in the organizations change," Howard said.

One audience member asked what the panel members thought of attempts to end affirmative action.

Dempsey-Swopes said the main opposition to affirmative action comes from people who don't understand it.

"These people don't understand the reality in the work place," she said,

> "Those who believe in reverse discrimination are people who feel threatened by minorities. A lot of people don't know that the major benefactors of affirmative action are women. Some of the Republicans who are against it probably have wives that were hired by affirmative action."

"and they are using myths to justify getting rid of affirmative action."

Anderson said the idea of reverse discrimination is a myth. She said it rarely, if ever, happens.

"Those who believe in reverse discrimination are people who feel threatened by minorities," she said. "A lot of people don't know that the major benefactors of affirmative action are women. Some of the Republicans who are against it probably have wives that were hired by affirmative action."

Dempsey-Swopes said unqualified people being hired because of affirmative action is also a myth. She said people occasionally abuse the system, but it is rare.

The affirmative action office also handles discrimination complaints on campus.

"I would say, yes, there is discrimination at the University in employment and classroom in subtle and overt ways," Anderson said.

Frieman said discrimination often goes unreported.

"We don't know when people don't tell us," he said.

"Of course, I throw the ball to myself," Lockett said. "It wouldn't be any fun if I didn't. Everybody knows that I'm the best receiver on this game."

Schwieger said he puts himself in positions he does not play on the field.

"The first thing that I do is put myself in on kickoff return," Schwieger said. "I also try to throw it to myself a bunch of times. I don't throw it to Lockett, though, because he'll just drop the ball."

However, the game has not quite caught on with all K-State players.

K-State defensive end Nyle Wiren, junior in sociology, said he doesn't like the game because he loses all the time.

"The second time I played it I beat Tyson," Wiren said. "After that, I just get killed. I hate to lose. If I do play, I make whoever I play use a junky team.

"I don't want to play it again. I'll jump on it and break it if I lose. I just get too mad."

Nonetheless, College Football USA '96 has become a favorite off-field pastime for the K-State football team.

Woman raped off campus

Cori Cornelison
staff reporter

A 23-year-old woman was raped between 4 and 4:26 a.m. Sunday inside the Sigma Chi fraternity house.

Capt. Steve French of the Riley County Investigations Division said two men followed the victim into the Sigma Chi house, where she was going to meet a friend. The suspects grabbed the victim while she was in the foyer and brought her into a common area near the foyer where the assault occurred, he said.

The suspects are not members of Sigma Chi.

French said there is indication only one of the suspects raped the victim, who is not a K-State student, while the other was possibly the outlook.

Both suspects are described as black men in their early 20s, with short, cropped hair. They were wearing dark clothing at the time of the rape. The suspect who investigators said they believe raped the victim is about 5 feet 8 inches tall and 180 pounds. The other suspect is about 6 feet 1 inch and 185 pounds, French said.

Riley County investigators are working on composites of the suspects, he said.

The Sigma Chi housemother, Vicki Morgan, was the first person to find the victim after the assault, when she heard calls for help from the victim, French said.

Justin Boisseau, president of Sigma Chi, said no one was awake during the time of the assault and the housemother's room was closest to where the assault occurred.

Boisseau said 45 of the fraternity members' rooms are upstairs, 15 are on the first floor where the assault occurred, and a few members are in the basement. He said the assault did not occur close enough to the members' rooms to hear.

Authorities were contacted after the assault, and the victim received medical care, Boisseau said.

He said he wants to make it clear the assault did not involve any of the members or guests of the fraternity.

"We're working with the authorities to see that justice is served," Boisseau said. "The men in the house were shocked and saddened by the event."

The doors to the Sigma Chi house were not locked prior to or at the time of the assault, Boisseau said.

He said it was Dad's Weekend for the Sigma Chis and members were in and out of the house.

"Generally we don't have our doors locked up," Boisseau said.

He said with 65 men around, they don't worry too much about locking the doors for safety measures.

Words empower

■ Lecturer speaks out on homosexual stereotypes, negative image portrayed by church

Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words can empower me, the first lecturer during Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Week said Monday.

"Right now, the word 'homosexual' is being used to harm us by the religious right. If we can get that word changed or universally redefined, then it will not harm us but help with acceptance," said Dennis Dobson, chemist with the Kansas Department of Health.

The religious right has the most influence on the negative image or reinforcement of the stereotypical image of homosexuals, he said.

"The choice of words and phrases definitely influence the public, so we need to be aware of this when speaking to others and the media," he said.

The language the religious right uses can give a false impression, he said.

"We need to give a clear understanding of the truth and counteract what those who are against us say," he said.

Dobson, who was raised in a Southern Baptist household, was taught that homosexuality was a sin.

"The two biggest sins, I was told, were being homosexual and being a Catholic," he said.

"Now I do not agree with this correlation," he said.

During grade school until his senior year in college, he had crushes on guys, but he did not think he was gay because he did not fit the definition of homosexuality that he was taught.

"My definition of homosexuality was men wanting to be women, men who wanted to wear women's clothes, men who have a lisp, men with a limp wrist and men who are feminine," he said.

Dobson's definition of homosexuality has changed since coming out; now, his definition means being capable of loving someone of the same gender.

"I am capable of loving whomever I love," he said.

For young homosexuals, coming out can be empowering, and individuals must be comfortable with where they are in the process, he said.

"Coming out is a process, a continual process. If you stay in the closet, you are unnecessarily wasting psychological energy, when people around probably already have an idea," he said.

Sarah Kanning, graduate student in English literature, said Monday's lecture was a necessary presentation.

"Not only did he stress the importance of coming out, but also he stressed the importance of watching what we say when we speak publicly," she said.

Homosexuals, like it or not, are in the fish bowl, she said.

"This means we are under observation as to what we say or do, because this has an effect on all gay people sometimes," she said.

A homosexual man in attendance said he felt Dobson was impressive.

"It brings to light that the rhetoric of the religious right is often harsh because of its shock value, and that is all it is, shock value," he said.

With the definition Dobson gave about homosexuality, it blows them away, he said.

"Love has no gender," he said.

The homosexual movement is not a revolutionary movement or new movement, because homosexuals have been working on it since 1889, Dobson said.

"We are a revival movement redefining how we can survive today with a new structure and environment. This can be very liberating because we are taking from the past and applying to the future," he said.

Coming out puts a face on the words, Dobson said.

"Without telling others, there is no culture," he said.

▶ FACULTY SENATE

Plus/minus system may be debated again

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate's Academic Affairs committee is trying to be pro-active instead of reactive on the issue of plus/minus grading.

Plus/minus grading would mean teachers could give out pluses or minuses, which would change students' GPAs by a few decimal points.

Plus/minus was an issue 1-1/2 years ago.

Some faculty said they wanted more flexibility in the grades they gave, and the pluses could help students with lower GPAs. Some students said the system could hurt A students.

After much debate, the proposal was not passed by Faculty Senate. Faculty Senate might be bringing the issue up again.

"Today, I called peer institutions to see what they do," said Aubrey Abbott, Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate.

Abbott spoke with a student at Iowa State who was in favor of the program.

Iowa State has had the system in place for several years, she said.

She also spoke with a student from Oklahoma State University. Plus/minus grading has never been an issue there, so he did not have much information, she said.

Jason Bitter, business senator, said he did not want to see the committee jump the gun on the issue.

"I would like to see Faculty Senate bring it up before we start running ads in the Collegian and distributing surveys," he said.

Chris Jones, at-large committee member, disagreed.

"If we wait until Faculty Senate make it an issue, then it'll be too late," Jones said. "It will come up in the next two to three years definitely."

Abbott said Senate might be able to keep Faculty Senate from bringing the issue up again if it was pro-active.

Bitter said he was working with the Department of Educational Advancement to create a survey on the plus/minus grading system to distribute to students.

He said he would have a better idea of what the survey would be like for the next meeting, Oct. 16.

▶ TAIWANESE HOLIDAY

Students celebrate day of national pride with dancing, parade

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

No ribbons, no fireworks and no red and blue banners are flying today, but there is a celebration.

Pride is bubbling in the heart of K-State's Taiwanese students.

Today is the Taiwanese national holiday, Double 10, which is a celebration of national pride.

"This day is like an American Fourth of July," said Ming-Hsiang Chen, graduate student in international business and president of Taiwanese Student Association.

The small country of Taiwan, which is about the size of Massachusetts, celebrates Double 10 on a big scale.

"This is the opportunity for everyone to celebrate. Many people who are overseas come back home because this is a chance for our people to come together," Chen said.

Many of the country's citizens gather at Taipei, Taiwan's capital, at 5 a.m. This a chance for people to interact with each other, and the president gives a speech, Chen said.

"There will also definitely be folk dancing and many live concerts that are broadcast, so that all the Taiwanese people can watch it on TV," Chen said.

The day also includes a parade with many different ethnic groups, Chen said. Everyone participates in the parade, even the military. They put on air shows, the soldiers fire their guns and talk about the military.

One of Chen's favorite parts of the celebration is the fireworks at night.

"It's really fantastic because you can be at any place in Taiwan and you can see them," Chen said.

A member of the Taiwanese student association, Chi-Wei Lin, graduate student in counseling, said he can-

Speaker says volunteers are key to lasting success of community

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

Volunteers are the force behind creating a lasting healthy community, a Sustainable Seattle management team member said Monday.

"The wealth of society, the wealth of a city, is the people," said Richard Conlin, Sustainable Seattle management team member.

Conlin presented "Living Today as if Tomorrow Matters: Ways to Create Community Sustainability" Monday night at the Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

The Sustainable Seattle project utilizes volunteers to ensure long-term social, cultural, economical and environmental health and vitality, he said.

"We have a strong belief in volunteerism," he said.

The commitment of citizens is what makes a successful society.

"Participation brings ownership," he said.

An organization can make plans, but people must be involved for the plans to be owned and successful, he said.

Volunteers were used to develop the focus of the Seattle Project.

A team of 30 people developed after a board of trustees was formed. Those individuals then asked 300 residents to serve on a civic panel. The group worked for six months and developed 99 indicators. From there, more research was done and a final list of 40 indicators were established.

"We don't define goals or benchmarks for indicators. We look for trends," he said.

PETERSON TO RETURN IN 2 WEEKS AFTER MONTH-LONG HOSPITAL STAY

K-State's student body president will be back in Manhattan and on campus in two weeks.

Jeff Peterson, student body president, was hospitalized Sept. 16 and had surgery Sept. 26 for an infected pressure sore.

Last fall, Peterson suffered from the same problem and was away from campus for six weeks.

"I don't have a definite date yet," Peterson said. "But I'll be back in two weeks for sure."

Peterson said he has an appointment with his doctor next week, and he should find out then when he will be able to come back to campus.

Peterson

"I'm out of the main hospital," Peterson said.

He said he is in a rehabilitation hospital where he is working on exercises and getting ready to sit up and do things on his own again.

"They'll keep me here until I can do those things myself," he said.

Peterson said he was starting to get excited about coming back to campus.

"It's starting to finally get close," he said.

Although Peterson will be back in two weeks, he will not be returning to his full-time responsibilities for three to four weeks.

Peterson said Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, and Jenni Cheatham, chief of staff, have been working hard and have taken over many of his responsibilities in his absence.

POPE WRAPS UP VISIT SUNDAY, URGING FAITHFUL TO REMAIN MORAL

BALTIMORE (AP) — Preaching in the cradle of U.S. Catholicism, Pope John Paul II urged the faithful Sunday to heed America's founding fathers and bring religious convictions to bear on political issues.

On the final day of his fourth U.S. pilgrimage, the pope celebrated Mass from an altar in centerfield, the location of a saloon run by Babe Ruth's father 100 years ago.

"Every generation of Americans needs to know that freedom consists not in doing what we like, but in having the right to do what we ought," John Paul said, warning of the dangers of a permissive society lacking a moral foundation.

On a sunny autumn day, the scoreboard at Oriole Park displayed the message, "He is here," as the rock group Boyz II Men serenaded the pontiff touring the stadium in his popemobile.

CLARIFICATIONS

➤ In Friday's Collegian, the "Lack of ethics spurs Student Senate resignation" story reported that Senator Michael Henry's motion to move into executive session was ruled out of order. It should have stated that Henry withdrew his motion after discussion of whether the motion to move to executive session was out of order or not.

➤ In Friday's Collegian, the letter to Cassandra implied that an assault of two men and their dog on Aug. 20 "was hushed up for weeks" and that "William Kennedy would have hated letting the Wildcats lose because of" then K-State quarterback Chad May's DUI. The assault of two men and their dog had been investigated since the reporting of the incident. Also, William Kennedy's office, the Riley County attorney's office, was not involved with Chad May's DUI. The DUI case was a city of Manhattan case, not a Riley County case.

➤ The Collegian regrets the errors and apologizes to William Kennedy for the implications cited in the letter to Cassandra.

K-State license plates delayed by legislative technicalities

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

K-State could have its own Kansas license plates, but the legislation that would have implemented the program has problems that have kept it from getting off the ground.

In February, a college license plate bill was proposed to the Kansas Legislature by Bill Stallard, resident of Wamego and K-State alumnus.

The bill would allow all of the Kansas Board of Regents and State Board of Education colleges to create their own license plates.

However, neither K-State nor any of the other schools are participating in the program.

The license plates were to be developed by the schools' alumni associations, and most of the money would go back to the schools in the form of scholarships.

Stallard said the bill was passed by the Legislature in the spring, but not many people know about the program because it hasn't been promoted by the University.

"First of all, there had to be a minimum order of 500 plates before the Department of Motor Vehicles would start ordering the tags," Stallard said.

To order the license plate, a person would have to send the money for the plate to the KSU Alumni Association, which would give that person a voucher to give to the county treasurer.

The county treasurer would then send the voucher for the license plate to the Department of Motor Vehicles, but the tag couldn't be picked up until the old tag expired.

"This is where we ran into problems," Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, said.

"Some people might have to wait over a year to get their tags after paying for them because the Department of Revenue wanted to print all of the tags at once for that year. It was convenient for them but extremely inconvenient for the buyers," Adkins said.

Stallard said because the bill passed into law, if 500 people were to send money to the Alumni Association, they would have to issue the vouchers for the tags.

Adkins said this isn't technically true.

"It's up to the Alumni Association to develop the certificates for the tags," he said. "If they choose not to, there really is no way for the program to get started. We did it this way so the administrative burden wasn't on the state."

Amy Renz, Alumni Association president, said she thinks the program is a good idea, but it needs minor adjustments before it will be implemented.

"We're very supportive of the program," Renz said, "but right now, it is so complicated that it's easier to just wait and have the bill amended."

"We also wanted to make sure that our plate design is something distinct from any K-State plate available," she said, "and as of right now, our design hasn't been approved."

The proposed design would have an outline of Anderson Hall on a screened background with a power cat in the corner, Renz said.

Adkins also said he hopes to make a proposal to amend the legislation to get a program that is successful and one everyone agrees on.

"I hope we can fix it so that the cost is not so high that everyone who can afford one will get one," Adkins said.

"My advice is to be patient, and hopefully, in the 1996 session, something will be passed to reform the bill so that it will work," he said.

Stallard said he also plans to work with the Alumni Association to find a way to get the program started.

In the meantime, people are finding other ways to support K-State.

Riley County just happened to get a sequence of license plates this summer with the letters KSU. The plates sold out fast.

"If the plates were anything different, it would've taken us at least four to six weeks to go through them," Eileen King, county treasurer, said. "We had to get 1,100 tags from Geary County because these were gone in three days."

Because the license plates were part of the usual sequence, only 1,000 were available.

"Most people just wanted to replace their old tags with these to show school spirit," King said, "so we just had them turn in their old plates and pay the usual $3 replacement fee."

License plates are distributed alphabetically by county. King said it was just a coincidence the letter sequence was KSU.

If the KSU plates were a missed opportunity, there are still other ways to support the Wildcats. A lot of people put a decal of the power cat logo on their tags.

"We sell quite a few. We have them in strips or people can buy them individually, and a lot of people have been wanting them for their tags," said Doug Wood, customer service at Varney's Book Store.

This might raise the question of legality.

"Placing the sticker on the tag could be considered illegal, but what I think we're concerned about is any defacing in an attempt to conceal or alter any information on the tag," said Sgt. Hank Nelson of the Riley County Police Department. "In this case, people just want to show school spirit, and I think we can all live with that."

Train derails; terrorist organization suspected

■ Note found at scene
mentions Waco, Ruby Ridge

Associated Press

HYDER, Ariz. — Saboteurs calling themselves "Sons of Gestapo" pulled 29 spikes from a stretch of railroad track, sending an Amtrak train hurtling off a bridge into a dry stream bed Monday, authorities said. One person was killed, and about 100 were injured.

A note found outside the train in a remote expanse of desert referred to the federal sieges at Waco, Texas, and Ruby Ridge, Idaho — both rallying cries for right-wing, anti-government extremists.

"That's what leads me to believe this is a terrorist attack," Maricopa County Sheriff, Joe Arpaio, said. Asked who might be responsible, he said, "It leans toward the domestic side."

Amtrak's Sunset Limited, bound from Miami to Los Angeles with 248 passengers and 20 crew members, derailed while crossing a 30-foot-high bridge 50 to 60 miles southwest of Phoenix sometime after 1 a.m.

Four cars plunged from the bridge at 50 mph, with three coming to rest on their sides on the sandy bottom of the desert wash. Passengers, jolted awake, made their way through jumbled belongings and crawled out the windows.

"I heard babies screaming, and their mother was hollering each one of their names, one after the other," said Betty Addington, 60, of Dallas, who was traveling with her 80-year-old mother to visit a sister in Los Angeles.

One person was killed, 12 were seriously hurt and about 100 others suffered less serious injuries, said Sgt. Tim Campbell, a sheriff's spokesman. Some were treated at the scene, and at least 67 were taken to Phoenix hospitals.

Amtrak put the total number of injured at 78. The railroad identified the dead man as Mitchell Bates, 41, a sleeping-car attendant based in Los Angeles.

"The last thing he said to me before he went to bed last night was 'See you tomorrow, baby doll,'" said Helen Martinez of Los Angeles, a waitress on the train.

Phoenix hospitals reported treating at least 40 people, including one woman who was listed in critical condition. Among the hospitalized were a 3-month-old boy and a 31-year-old woman who was on her honeymoon.

Deputies found a one- or two-page message signed "Sons of Gestapo" at the scene, the sheriff said.

The note referred to the government sieges at Waco and Ruby Ridge, the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

An electronic database search of U.S. newspapers big and small found no mention of a "Sons of Gestapo." A search of about six months' worth of Internet discussion groups and World Wide Web pages also found nothing.

The site — 27 miles east of this speck on the map of southwestern Arizona — is accessible only by air and by four-wheel-drive vehicle. It took an hour for the first rescuers to reach the victims.

Investigators from the FBI, National Transportation Safety Board and other federal and state agencies combed the scene.

The sheriff said the saboteurs somehow separated the rail and a wire was attached to disable an electronic system that would have warned the crew of a break in the line.

Investigators found that in a 19-foot section of track, 29 of the spikes that held the rail to the wooden cross ties had been pulled out, according to a source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Amtrak President Thomas M. Downs told a Washington news conference that someone removed a 36-inch steel bar weighing about 18 pounds that is used to connect two sections of rail. He said he hadn't heard about the spikes being removed.

"Someone obviously intended to drop the train off the trestle into the ravine," Downs said.

The bars are bolted to the rails and keep them from separating when trains pass over, Downs explained. He said the sabotage could have been done in about 10 minutes by someone with a rudimentary knowledge of railroading.

The last train to pass the spot was a freight that used the track about 18 hours before the wreck, Downs said. He didn't know when the tracks were last inspected; ABC reported the last inspection was Thursday.

Amtrak bolstered security on its tracks and asked freight companies whose tracks it uses to do the same, Downs said. Amtrak hadn't received any specific warnings in recent days, he said.

Derailing or wrecking a train involved in interstate commerce or its track or trestle is a federal felony, punishable by up to 20 years in prison.

If death results from the crime, the death penalty can be imposed.

Klanwatch, an organization that tracks hate groups as part of the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala., has never heard of "Sons of Gestapo," Joe Roy, Klanwatch director, said.

He said it could be some kind of local group, or a local farmer angry at Amtrak for cutting across his land.

Roy said Arizona is a hotbed of anti-government paramilitary and white supremacist groups. Klanwatch counts about 20 groups in each category, he said.

Roberto Concepcion, an Amtrak bartender being treated in a Phoenix hospital, said a man he recognized as a passenger approached him after the wreck with a one-page typewritten document the passenger identified as an anti-government manifesto.

The passenger described the paper as anti-ATF, anti-FBI and anti-government and said there were more copies lying around, according to Concepcion, who didn't read it before giving it to deputies.

Privilege fees preserve quality of life at K-State

In the worst-case scenario of user fees, the student-supported services could be in danger of being eliminated due to lack of funding.

The user-fee debate has eaten up a great deal of time in student government and much newsprint in the Collegian.

Although the concept is in its infancy, if it is instituted, user fees could also devour the quality of life at K-State.

The idea of user fees replacing the existing system of privilege fees could conceivably limit the opportunity for students to use the services these fees would support.

For example, the $70 fee for Lafene Health Center is a minimal expense if a student must have multiple office visits and medication during the semester.

This scenario could apply to any of the student-supported services on campus, even if a student doesn't regularly use these services. By spreading a smaller fee around to a larger number of students, as the current system does, then all students have the opportunity to benefit from these services.

Also, students would never be able to find comparable services for such reasonable prices (such as a health club membership for only $10.25 a semester.)

Students also have an advantage in the privilege fee system in that paying a large, lump sum at the beginning of the semester is easier for most students than paying as they go through the semester.

In the worst-case scenario of user fees, the student-supported services could be in danger of being eliminated due to lack of funding.

Privilege fees allow all students to shoulder the costs of these services and to ensure these services will be available and economical to whomever wants to use them.

Doubt looms over budget plan

I'm really impressed with Congressional Republicans.

Until this year, they were so kind, generous and loving. It must have been really hard for them to face up to the economic realities of the budget deficit. It goes against their very grain to cut Medicare and Medicaid.

But, they've finally come around to the fact that it has to be done. So, they're temporarily setting aside their gobs of human compassion, rolling up their sleeves, and cutting … taxes?

Something called the Coalition for Change is running advertisements on CNN and MTV, targeting young people.

COLUMN

JASON HAMILTON

The advertisement opens with a young, expensively dressed, attractive woman standing in her large studio apartment saying, "I just can't buh-lieve how much money they take out my paycheck for taxes."

But wait, there's more.

She goes on to claim her taxes (and ours, young people) are so high and will continue to get higher, because of the national debt, and she implies that elderly people are responsible for stealing our future.

The advertisement closes with the slogan: "Balance the Budget. No more excuses, DO IT NOW."

I thought this advertisement was so absurd that I nearly spit my 39-cent noodles all over the floor of my little living room.

Because not all of my readers may share my sense of this commercial's absurdity, I will explain myself.

First, although elderly people may very well be responsible the national debt, they are also probably responsible for the advertisement.

It is Newt Gingrich and Bob Dole, neither of whom are spring chickens, who have so far reaped the political benefit of the budget-balancing business.

Furthermore, the advertisement girl wants to pay off the national debt without paying more taxes. Hard to buh-lieve? Not at all! Congress has the plan for you!

Where can I find out more about this plan, you ask? Don't go away, Jason will lay it on you.

★ ITEM ONE of the plan: Slash Medicare benefits by $270 billion, and that's a lot of dollars. Wait, wait, I'm sorry.

The accepted line is they are going to fix Medicare. It's broken, and if we young people are going to want it around when we're old, it needs a little fixin'.

Of course, Medicare only needs $90 billion worth of fixin'. But you won't buh-lieve how much budget balancing and tax cutting they can do with that other $180 billion.

(You really won't buh-lieve it if your income is at or below the poverty line, because you won't see a bit of it.)

★ ITEM TWO of the plan: Slash Medicaid. One of the ways our pals, the Republicans, want to do this is to eliminate federal regulations concerning the standards and conditions in nursing homes.

After all, we can trust the states to take care of that, can't we?

(I guess it doesn't matter that those standards were imposed after rampant abuses of patients in nursing homes were discovered the last time we trusted the states).

★ ITEM THREE of the plan: Give the U.S. Armed Forces billions and billions of dollars more than they asked for.

Yup, its true. Those steely-eyed, square-jawed boys in the Defense Department came up with a budget that will allow them to build better weapons, train better soldiers, etc. They came up with a budget that allows the U.S. Armed Forces to fight two wars at once.

Congressional Republicans don't think that's good enough. They decided that all those generals and admirals and such just don't know much about military hardware.

They obviously need a few billion dollars more than they think (You wouldn't buh-lieve how hard it is to balance the budget with a weak army.)

★ ITEM FOUR of the plan: A (fanfare) TAX CUT!

That's what it's all about, see. Republican lawmakers know it's true, the affluent commercial girl knows it's true, so must we all accept that it's true — the problem with this country isn't crime, poor education, drug abuse, corruption, abortion or anything of the sort.

All of these are simply symptoms of a more serious social sickness: HIGH TAXES.

If taxes were just a little lower, all of us poor people wouldn't be so poor.

If taxes were just a little lower, we wouldn't feel the need to use all those drugs.

If taxes were just a little lower, O.J. Simpson's ex-wife might still be alive.

If taxes were just a little lower, we wouldn't have AIDS, unwanted pregnancies, immigration problems or hurricanes.

The list goes on. It's amazing how many problems are actually due to these oppressive taxes.

Our tax rates are some of the lowest in the industrialized world, which, of course, makes us the greatest country in the world.

All of those pinko Europeans can take their guaranteed health care, their higher standards of living and bugger off.

I could go on, but somehow I just don't buh-lieve it.

Individuals form religious views by personal choice

MATT HAWKINS

There is nothing inherently wrong with the concept of religion. If people choose to live a good life based upon old documents, more power to them.

The problem comes in when fanatical devotees of religion figure they are the best and then try to impose their religion on others. This can be seen here on campus with sign-board wearing fanatics and pamphlet-passing nuisances.

It can be seen nationally with the Christian right running stealth candidates all over and donating heavily to Republican coffers. It can also be seen in the terrorist activities of many pro-life activists.

It can be seen internationally with even more terrorist activity perpetrated by zealots of many religions.

Of the three, the only one defendable is the type of activity that happens here on campus. These people have the right to speak their mind, and we have the right to ignore them. This is quite different from trying to make law many would disagree with or taking someone's life if they don't agree with you.

The way many of these people defend their actions is to claim there are moral absolutes and they are the sole recipients of this knowledge.

Of course, there are hundreds of groups that claim to be this sole recipient.

COLUMN

LACH FRANQUEMONT

I don't know whether there are any moral absolutes, but if there are, I doubt that we as humans can know what they are. I would think things like murder would come close, but evidently many religions see nothing wrong with this as long as it's done in the name of God.

Joycelyn Elders said in her speech last Thursday, "Organized religion needs to stop moralizing from the pulpit on Sundays and instead get out and get to work."

She's right.

Instead of imagining a perfect world where no one does wrong and no problems exist, they need to take stock of the real situation and see what can be done constructively to improve it.

I do not mean that they should go about converting people to their religion or passing laws to force others to conform to their morality.

As Elders said, people need to be educated. Forcing people to do things is not education.

One problem I've always had with the pro-life crowd is they are the same people who object to sex education and the same people who object to taking care of these children once they're born.

They care if a woman wants to make a choice about her own body but not if a child is subjected to a life of poverty.

Maybe they should start looking to improve the quality of life that all children will have.

The day these right-to-life groups start distributing condoms in school is the day they have finally taken a concrete step in cutting back on abortions. Educate kids in a realistic way about sex and part of the problem will be solved.

You see, I don't really like the concept of abortion myself, but I don't think my opinion on it should effect how anyone else should feel about it.

I'm not saying all people who follow a religious way of life are like what I've just portrayed.

In fact, the majority of them are not. It is the overzealous few who give religion a bad name.

All we can do in life is look for a way we feel is correct for us.

For many people, religion may be just the ticket.

It is important to realize, however, not everyone who is good is religious and not everyone who claims to be religious is good.

I am a bit leery, though, with anything that presumes to tell me all the answers.

▶ THANKS TO GIDEONS

Editor,

I would just like to say "thank you" to the gentlemen who have generously donated of themselves to provide New Testaments without any commitment or obligation from any and all who would like one.

In all of the years I have lived in Manhattan, I have always been impressed with the way these gentlemen have offered an alternative point of view that is dismally lacking here at K-State without pushing it on anyone.

They have always been pleasant, respectful of others and have quietly offered a simple, little book to anyone who reached out their hand.

I have known gentlemen who have been associated with the Gideons, and they have all been very decent, honorable and professional people who have always treated others with respect.

Sadly, this same treatment has not always been shown to them.

Often they have been insulted, taunted and targeted for argument and abuse.

But, the Gideons have stayed true to the Word that they offer to others.

Thanks again to the Gideons for their efforts and for standing firm on their First Amendment rights when others would seek to stifle those rights and pursue other action that are the products of truly closed minds.

I stand with them and, make no mistake, I will not be moved from standing on the rock and my God-given rights that are not mere privileges to be granted or rescinded by anyone.

▶ CHILDREN OF THE JUICE

Editor,

Many times I have read columns in the Collegian and have been in disagreement with the basic premise behind the column. But (with the exception of Kevyn Jacobs) I have always thought the positions were well thought-out, even when I disagreed.

I would like to thank Erin Mansur-Smith for her sensitivity and vulnerability in dealing with the topic of abuse and O.J.'s children.

Being a conservative, white, Christian male, I sometimes disagree with Mansur-Smith, although she always provokes and prods my mind.

But this time, she has done a wonderful, wonderful job.

Thank you, Erin — and here's hoping O.J. never gets a chance to beat his children like he beat their mother.

the great Clapper Caper

text by Nicole Kirby
file photos courtesy of the Bell Clapper, the 1905 yearbook

For years, a piece of K-State history was tucked away in a Medford, Ore., attic. Now it's coming home.

On campus, the newly restored Bluemont Bell appears complete, but the clapper is an impostor. The original clapper had been hidden in Ernestyn Thompson Charley's home for decades.

Charley's uncle, Charles Thompson, and four other members of the K-State Agricultural College class of 1905, were nicknamed the Naughty Five for stealing the clapper on a dark night in 1905, according to a University Archive story.

Members of the Naughty Five climbed Anderson Hall's tower to steal the clapper, Charley said.

The next morning, the bell rang late. That was the only tardy day in the bell's history. After the missing clapper was detected, a custodian was forced to bang on it with a hammer.

Soon after the college constructed two clappers — one for storage just in case it was stolen again.

"Nobody will state for sure who got the clapper," Charley said.

Thompson never admitted to the crime, but his brother, John Bert Thompson, was also a member of the class of 1905 and knew about the plot through the planning stages.

John Bert Thompson, Charley's father, confirmed Charles Thompson as a member of the Naughty Five.

"Uncle Charlie hadn't denied it at his death," Charley said.

One of the other four pranksters was Harry Umberger, later a dean at K-State and Umberger Hall's namesake.

"They planned to make class rings out of it, but it turned out to be made of iron," Charley said.

The clapper fell into the hands of Charles Thompson, and he stored it until his death.

Thompson's family gave the clapper to his brother-in-law, Albert Werner, who was a member of the class of 1907.

When Werner died, the family passed it on to Charley because of her father's connection to the pranksters.

Charley stored the clapper in her closet for years, but her husband threatened to throw it away. After that, it was stored in the attic above the garage for safekeeping.

Jerry Carter, University architect, said he was unaware the clapper in K-State's bell was not the original one.

"I'd be very interested in being able to get the original clapper," Carter said after learning of its existence and the possibility of its return.

Carter said he is reluctant to replace the present clapper with the original one, because the current one has been sealed against the weather. However, he said he would like to put the original on display inside Bluemont Hall.

The original wooden-pulley wheel, with which custodians used to ring the bell, will be placed in a glass display case in Bluemont Hall. Carter said the case is also an ideal place to display the clapper.

"When you walk in the north entrance of Bluemont, you would see the wheel and any other artifacts that were too fragile to put out on the bell," Carter said.

Carter contacted Charley and asked her to send the clapper, as well as a letter explaining how she came to have it and who had possessed it during the years.

Charley sent the clapper to Carter by United Parcel Service on Friday and spent most of Sunday writing its known history.

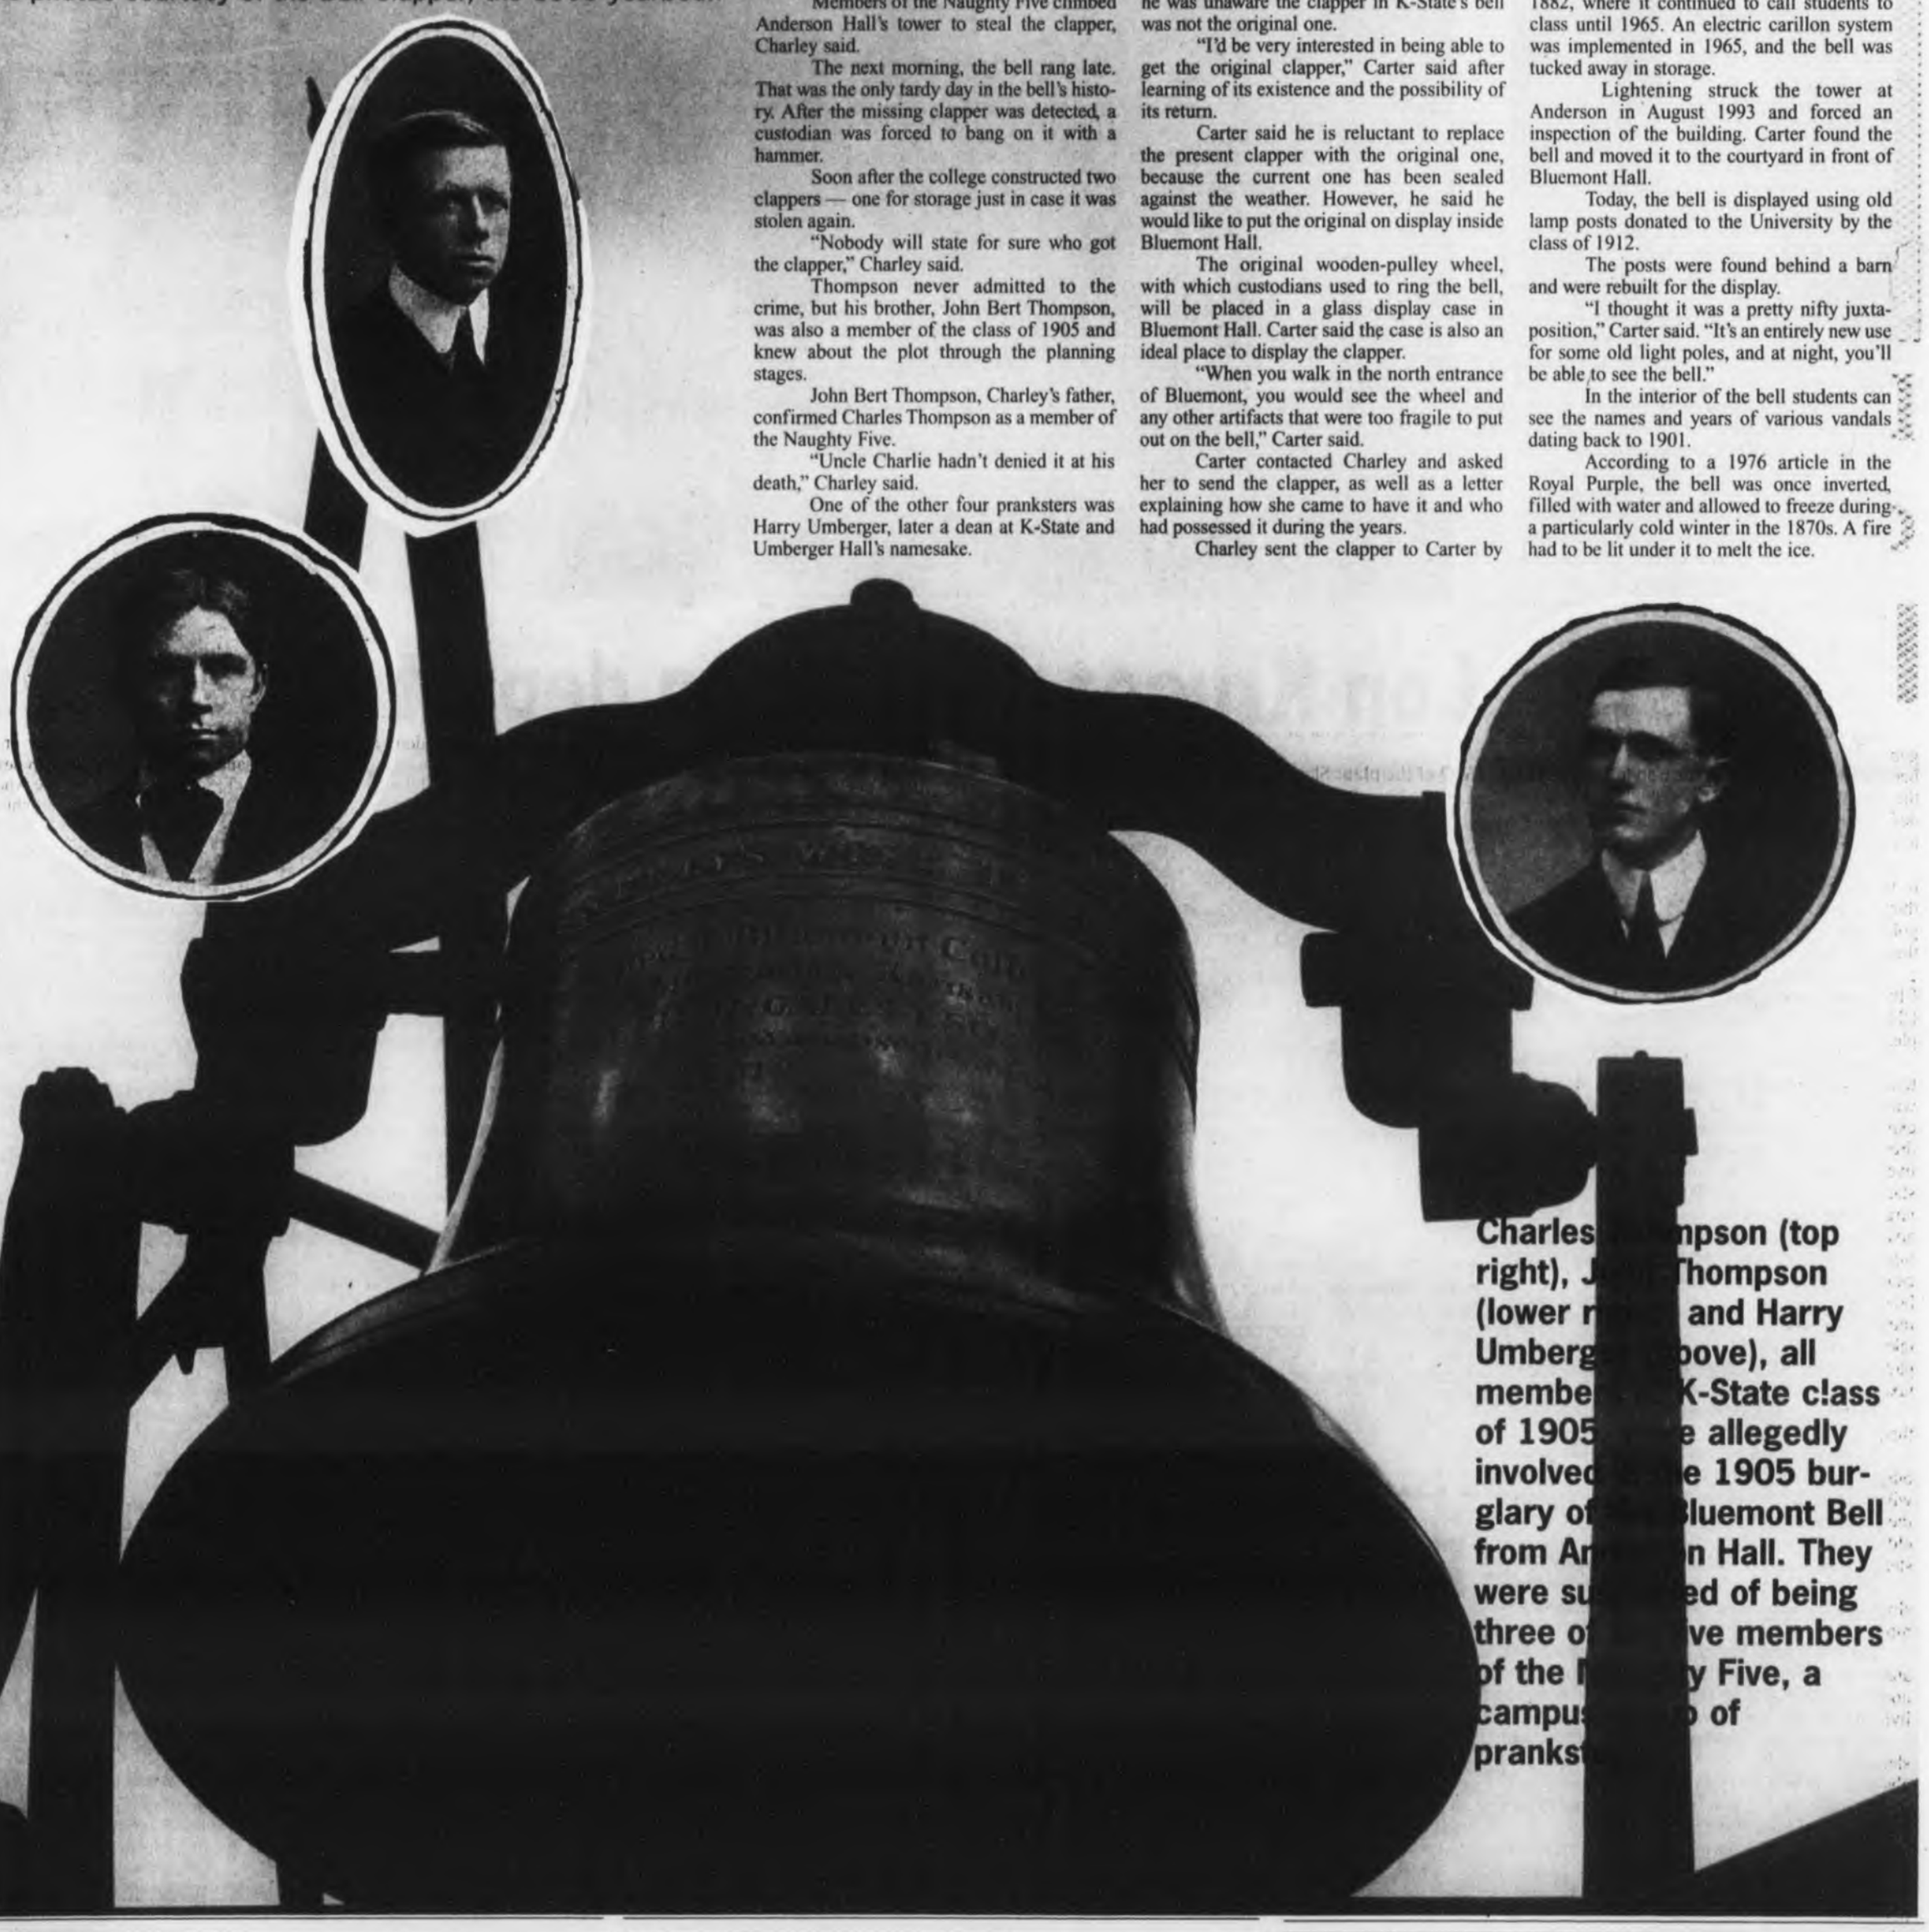
"I spent all of today, with a little time out to watch a ballgame, writing down everything I know about whose closets it's been in. Now it's come out of the closet," Charley said.

The K-State Bell, with the original clapper, was a gift to Bluemont College in 1861 from Joseph Ingalls, a wealthy benefactor.

When the college moved to the present campus site in 1875, the bell was moved from the top of the Bluemont Central College building to a transformed barn which was later the Farm Machinery Hall.

After the construction of Anderson Hall, the bell was transferred to its tower in 1882, where it continued to call students to class until 1965. An electric carillon system was implemented in 1965, and the bell was tucked away in storage.

Lightening struck the tower at Anderson in August 1993 and forced an inspection of the building. Carter found the bell and moved it to the courtyard in front of Bluemont Hall.



Today, the bell is displayed using old lamp posts donated to the University by the class of 1912.

The posts were found behind a barn and were rebuilt for the display.

"I thought it was a pretty nifty juxtaposition," Carter said. "It's an entirely new use for some old light poles, and at night, you'll be able to see the bell."

In the interior of the bell students can see the names and years of various vandals dating back to 1901.

According to a 1976 article in the Royal Purple, the bell was once inverted, filled with water and allowed to freeze during a particularly cold winter in the 1870s. A fire had to be lit under it to melt the ice.

Dog hair a factor in this year's Series

COLUMN

SHANA NEWELL

The Braves, the Mariners, the Indians and the Reds — what a cast for this year's big show.

And those who auditioned but failed to make it? What about those Dodgers, Rockies, Red Sox and Yankees?

I would have loved to have seen a Dodgers vs. Rockies National League Championship Series. Or how about Dodgers vs. Braves?

Dodgers vs. anyone would have pleased me tremendously, but then again, the Reds did an extraordinary job of annihilating my boys in blue this year.

But just wait until next year. Mike Piazza, Brett Butler, Eric Karros and Tim Wallach will reign supreme.

In only their third season of existence, the Rockies did an impressive job of making a stand against the Braves in game three but proved they aren't as solid of a team on the road.

Although their bats can send balls far, far into the mountains of Denver, the Atlanta pitching staff just didn't give the Rockies that chance last week.

So, we have the Reds vs. Braves battle beginning Tuesday night. What's going to happen now?

With the best pitching in the nation on the Atlanta crew, one wonders how Cincy can hold up.

But not only does the riverfront team have the speed, the defense and the bat power throughout the lineup, they also have Schotzy II's hair for good luck.

What can compete with luck and superstition? It's a well-known fact that baseball players depend heavily on superstition to produce numbers and wins.

I look for Cincinnati to win, and it will be an electrifying seven-game struggle.

Both teams have had World Series fever since the All-Star Break, and both teams wholeheartedly believe they deserve to be the stars of the show.

But the Reds have Ron Gant, Reggie Sanders and, of course, Barry Larkin.

This team has enough talent, smarts and power to light up the Braves pitching, with possibly the exception of Greg Maddux. The tomahawk chop couldn't even save the Atlanta sticks now.

In the American League, a repeat of the 1948 AL Championship series between the Boston Red Sox and the New York Yankees would have been exciting.

Granted, there's no Ted Williams or Joe DiMaggio, but there is Jose Canseco and Don Mattingly.

But that, too, will have to wait until next season, for both teams succumbed to their rivals as the Seattle Mariners and the Cleveland Indians now take the spotlight in the American League.

With Ken Griffey Jr., Mike Blowers, Luis Sojo and Randy Johnson boldly leading the Mariner offense, and Indians Albert Belle, Jim Thome, Eddie Murray and Dennis Martinez tearing up ballparks, the ALCS should be interesting.

Don't look for as much excitement or as thrilling finishes in this series as there will be in the NLCS.

Both teams are tremendously talented and Seattle has definitely given the tribe trouble this season, but Cleveland has the staying power it needs to endure.

Every position on the Indians' lineup has strength, and they prove it with impressive batting averages. If the power spots don't produce, Indian fans can count on the top or the bottom of the order to get the job done.

Plus, they have a vendetta against Randy Johnson and the rest of the Mariners after a July shutout in Seattle by Johnson that included 13 Indian strikeouts.

The Mariners better hope for some more shutouts against Cleveland, because this season has been successful for the Indians when it comes to extra innings and one-run games.

My prediction? Cleveland in five and Cincinnati in seven.

Who will win the prize? As a diehard Dodger-fan, it pains me to admit this, but Cincinnati will take the final bow of the show.

But whatever team survives, it deserves the honor.

I'm just glad there's a World Series this year.

Lon Kruger reflects on departure, Florida

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Eight years ago, Lon Kruger coached the K-State men's basketball team to within one game of the Final Four.

Eighteen months ago, Kruger made the next step, but it wasn't with the Wildcats.

Kruger, then in his fourth season at Florida, led the Gators to the Final Four, nearly upsetting Duke for the right to play for the national championship.

K-State, on the other hand, has advanced to the NCAA Tournament only once in the five years since Kruger took the Cats to the dance in four consecutive seasons before leaving for Gainesville after the 1990 season.

Even so, Kruger said it was tough for him and his family to leave Manhattan, where Kruger went to school for four years, spent three years as an assistant and coach for four more, compiling four winning seasons and two 20-win seasons.

"It was very tough," Kruger said in an interview with the Collegian Saturday morning at Bramlage Coliseum's Legends Room. "This is our home. Manhattan has outstanding people and we have outstanding memories, and anytime you make a decision to leave a lot of lifetime friends and those type of memories, it's very difficult."

Kruger was in town this past weekend along with dozens of other former K-State players to honor former K-State coach Jack Hartman, whom Kruger played for and succeeded as coach in 1986.

"Really, this was the first time we've been back because of other activities," Kruger said. "We don't have the opportunity to come back as much as we like to."

While the alumni contributed to the demise of Kruger's successor, Dana Altman, Kruger has nothing but praise for K-State fans.

"The people were great," Kruger said.

"They were always supportive and certainly, that's what it takes to have an outstanding program because it comes around to creating an atmosphere in Bramlage that gives a team a better opportunity to win," he said.

As any coach at K-State would attest, recruiting athletes to the Manhattan is difficult.

But Kruger said a coach has to be inventive in every situation.

"Every situation is unique," Kruger said.

"There's not a situation that has the best of all worlds. At K- State, there's outstanding things to recruit to, and that's why you get good players. You have to identify what you have that interest other people."

With Tom Asbury in his second year at the helm, Kruger said the K-State program is headed in the right direction.

"In the situation here with Coach Asbury, they'll do an outstanding job, and they'll recruit the type of people that fit well at K-State," Kruger said. "It's a good match, he'll do a great job at K-State."

After Kruger left his mark and had one of the best coaches in K-State history with a .628 winning percentage (81-46), he inherited a Florida program on probation and filled with controversy.

The Gators went 11-17, 19-14 and 16-12 in Kruger's first three seasons. But in the 1993-94 campaign, the Gators exploded, going 29-8, winning the SEC Eastern Division, and advancing to the Final Four in Charlotte.

"It was very special because a lot of good teams each year and a lot of good coaches throughout their career never have that opportunity," Kruger said.

"It was special from the standpoint of seeing that the group of young people we worked with felt the satisfaction of what they worked for all year," he said.

If there was a downside to the great season, it was that everyone started to shoot for the Gators last season.

"I think anytime you come off a year when you went to the Final Four or have a very good season, teams are pointing toward you differently," Kruger said.

Florida struggled during the 1994-95 season but advanced to the NCAA after a strong showing in the SEC Tournament. The Gators had a lead in their first-round game against Iowa State but fell to the Cyclones.

"That was frustrating," Kruger said. "Anytime you have a game in hand by a little bit and don't finish it, it's frustrating especially in an NCAA Tournament game."

While K-State will look to improve off last season's performance, Kruger must rebuild a team without point guard Dan Cross and forward Andrew DeClercq.

"It'll be a young group this year," Kruger said. "It'll be an exciting group and a fun group to work with, and yet, it's tough to replace some of the guys we lost."

Kruger's Florida team hosts Kansas in January, but don't expect that Gators to travel to Bramlage anytime soon.

"We wouldn't be interested in doing that," Kruger said. "That would be a situation where there wouldn't be any winners from my perspective — because I want K-State to win, and I certainly want our clubs to win, so we wouldn't entertain that thought."

▶ KANSAS CITY CHIEFS

Bono, Vanover produce season's 3rd OT victory

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Steve Bono did his best Joe-Montana imitation. Tamarick Vanover did the rest.

Vanover, a rookie who played in the CFL last season after leaving Florida State early, returned a punt 86 yards for a touchdown 7:27 into overtime Monday night, giving the Kansas City Chiefs a 29-23 victory over the San Diego Chargers.

The Chiefs, who won their third overtime game this season, had tied the score with 15 seconds left on a 78-yard drive engineered by Bono.

An 18-yard pass to Derrick Walker, followed by Lin Elliott's extra point, forced the fifth overtime game this weekend — an NFL record.

Then Neil Smith came alive in overtime, twice sacking Gale Gilbert, who replaced the injured Stan Humphries at quarterback for San Diego.

After the second, Darren Bennett punted and Vanover, who could have made a fair catch, grabbed the ball at the 14, evaded three tacklers and broke left around the wall to the end zone.

"I'm feeling joy right now," Vanover said. "I've been waiting all my life. I've been waiting all my life."

Kansas City raised its record to 5-1, tying the Chiefs for the best mark in the NFL with Dallas and Oakland.

John Carney kicked a 29-yard field goal with 1:12 left to give the Chargers (3-3) a 23-16 lead.

But Bono, who was 27 of 41 for 329 yards, drove the Chiefs 79 yards in eight plays in just 51 seconds with no timeouts, finding Walker from 18 yards out in the end zone to tie the game with 15 seconds left.

Humphries, who left at the end of regulation with a bruised right shoulder, was 24 of 34 for 315 yards and continually made big third-down plays, including a 44-yard pass to Ronnie Harmon that set up Carney's field goal.

Then, on a first down from the Kansas City 49, Humphries found Shawn Jefferson behind Dale Carter and he took it to the 4. On first down, he rolled out and flipped to Shannon Mitchell, the backup tight end, for the touchdown.

The first five possessions of the game resulted in scores.

Former K-Stater Andre Coleman, San Diego's kick returner, set up the only two touchdowns in the first half.

Coleman's 54-yard return set up the Chargers on the Chiefs' 37 and led to Natrone Means' 2-yard touchdown run that gave the Chargers a 10-3 lead 3:36 into the second period.

But after Elliott cut it to 10-6 with a 21-yarder, Coleman fumbled at his 22 on the return and Martin Bayless recovered, setting up Bono's 1-yard touchdown pass to Kimble Anders that made it 13-10.

Each team used its first possession to eat up the clock with little result — field goals by Carney and Elliott.

The Chargers used 19 plays to take the opening kickoff 63 yards and the Chiefs retaliated by going 67 yards in 14 plays.

▶ COLORADO ATHLETICS

Nike to provide CU teams with uniforms

Associated Press

BOULDER, Colo. — The University of Colorado has reached a $5.6-million agreement with Nike Inc. to equip the Buffaloes' intercollegiate athletic teams with Nike apparel through the 2000-2001 school year.

According to the agreement, Nike will equip 15 of Colorado's 17 intercollegiate sports teams with shoes, uniforms and other apparel. Nike hopes to profit from the exposure its products will receive when worn by CU athletes.

Many universities have struck agreements with athletic apparelmakers in recent years that permit their teams to equip themselves with their products at no cost. CU joins about a dozen other schools that have all-sports agreements with Nike.

Colorado's football team has had a contract with Nike since 1983, the men's basketball team since 1990 and the women's volleyball team since 1993.

Colorado athletic director Bill Marolt said the agreement will enable him to consolidate all sports team equipment purchases and deal with virtually all of the Buffs' athletic programs as one entity.

Colorado men's and women's skiing are the only sports not covered by the agreement.

The agreement will permit the Buffs to equip the sports programs with shoes, uniforms and other apparel either every year or every other year, CU officials said.

"This will better enable our athletic department to provide important benefits, such as quality and performance-proven products, to all of our sport programs," Marolt said.

The annual value of the agreement will range from $855,000 this school year to $970,000 in 2000-2001.

Marolt said the Nike partnership will lead to recycling and scholarship programs.

Nike has an established recycling program to convert used shoes to athletic surfacing and has expressed interest in supporting CU club and intramural programs, he said.

Marketing savvy makes, breaks live rock shows

COLUMN

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

So Union Program Council lost $40,000 on the Soul Asylum show.

So people are ringing the death knell of live rock music in Manhattan.

So what?

To quote Flavor Flav, "Don't believe the hype." Low attendance at live rock shows in Manhattan has more to do with poor marketing strategies than student apathy.

Popular live music venues in Lawrence take out advertisements in Pitch Weekly and the Kansas City New Times. They advertise in the University of Kansas Daily Kansan. They even put up flyers in Aggieville.

These flyers make a stroll through Aggieville more informative about bands coming to Lawrence than the bands coming to Aggieville.

No Manhattan clubs advertise their shows like Lawrence clubs do. It would seem they expect audiences to materialize out of the ether, cash and IDs in hand.

How about a telephone hotline with recorded messages, to describe upcoming shows? Again, Lawrence, yes, Manhattan, no.

In addition, bands, not the clubs, have to promote their Manhattan gigs. The costs of those flyers, which litter traffic signal poles around town, come out of the pockets of the bands.

Club Berlin has made a valiant effort to make itself a haven of live music by booking two bands to play there once a week. While the bands have been great, the promotion of these shows has consisted mostly of marquee announcements, and inaccurate ones at that.

Berlin doesn't advertise. Berlin doesn't put up flyers around campus. And Berlin doesn't get large audiences for its shows.

On the other hand, recent shows at Bombers that have been promoted with flyers on and off campus have attracted larger crowds than Berlin's.

People will pay a few bucks for entertainment if the drinks are cheap and the cover charge isn't too high.

Even Gerald Ford playing a butt trumpet would attract a large crowd if he was tooting away in a club selling 99-cent booze.

The Soul Asylum financial failure, on the other hand, is a slightly different situation.

Simply put, UPC booked a Top-40 band and promoted it to a college audience.

Now, common sense dictates instead of promoting Soul Asylum to the alternative/college music crowd, UPC should have opted for advertisements on those putrid Top-40 radio stations that played "Runaway Train" to death.

Some ads in the Wichita Eagle to attract Western and Southern Kansas fans wouldn't have hurt, either.

If UPC wanted to book a band for college rock fans, as UPC president Patrick Carney said, UPC should have booked one of the popular bands that recently have or soon will play in Lawrence.

The fact that UPC shows are in that smoke-free, alcohol-free echo chamber called Bramlage Coliseum instead of the Wareham Opera House doesn't help much, either.

UPC and local clubs have a lot to learn about booking successful concerts. Hopefully, they'll get educated soon.

Board slashes circulation

■ Fewer ads, printing

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

The Board of Student Publications finally balanced its budget Tuesday night, but not without a 2,500 circulation cut for the Collegian.

The board unanimously approved a $1.02-million budget for fiscal year 1996.

The Collegian made the cut from 14,000 to 11,500 issues a day earlier this semester to offset cost increases.

The fiscal year began July 1, but the budget had to be amended because a higher-than-expected increase in the cost of newsprint and lower-than-expected advertising revenue.

Student Publications newsprint costs have increased 50 percent in the last year.

Ben Clouse, Finance Committee chairman, said circulation was decreased because $10,000 more needed to be cut from the budget, and there was nowhere else to cut.

In an attempt to compensate for the cost increases, the Collegian has also been having tighter papers, which means the newspapers have had more advertisements and less news.

Clouse said the travel budget and employee benefits were also areas where Student Publications will be saving.

The cut was made earlier in the semester, but Ron Johnson, director of Student Publication, said he had not received many complaints about fewer newspapers being in the racks.

Johnson said he thought more people were reading the Collegian on the World Wide Web. He said 2,500 to 3,000 people from on and off campus are looking at the Electronic Collegian every day.

Amy Henderson, ad manger, said some national advertisers look at circulation before they decide to advertise with newspapers.

She said she was concerned a decrease in circulation could hurt the newspaper's national advertising.

William Feyerharm, board member, said he would like the board to keep looking at the press run and how the decrease is affecting readers.

Aaron Otto, board chairman, said he was not happy with the cuts that had to be made.

"This budget makes me nauseous," he said.

"We are not cutting corners, but we are having to make cuts. We are tightening the belt, but I am afraid we are tightening the belt so tight, we are cutting off circulation," Otto said.

The board also discussed an evaluation proposal of the Student Publications student staff.

Student workers from the Collegian, Royal Purple and ad staffs would have the opportunity to evaluate their superiors.

The evaluations would be confidential.

Otto said the information from the evaluations could be used by the board to make editor and manager hiring decisions in the future.

The board's personnel committee is still working on the details of the evaluation system.

▶ SERBS ATTACK REFUGEE CAMP, KILLING 6

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — A shell blamed on Serb rebels slammed into a government-run refugee camp Sunday, killing at least six people as both sides battled for precious land and better negotiating positions ahead of a cease-fire.

NATO deployed warplanes but did not strike at Serb targets. Maj. Myriam Sochacki, a U.N. spokeswoman, said bad weather that moved in later in the day made identifying Serb targets difficult and led to the decision to have the aircraft return to base.

U.N. spokesman Jim Lansdale said between six and 10 people were killed by the shell, which exploded at a refugee center in Zivinice, south of Tuzla.

Bosnian television said nine were killed and 50 wounded, 25 seriously.

▶ FREEDOM TO FARM ACT

Farm bill sent to budget committee

Dana Harding
staff reporter

The Freedom to Farm Act's next stop is the House Budget Committee.

With a 25-22 vote, the House Agriculture Committee rejected the proposal by Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan. The bill was backed by the House Republican Leadership.

However, the bill is not dead. Because the House Agriculture Committee cannot decide on a farm-cut package, the bill will be sent to the House Budget Committee.

The Budget Committee will be responsible for deciding on a package, because it has the primary responsibility for putting together the seven-year budget.

The Freedom to Farm Act would allow farmers to plant any mix of crops, excluding fruits and vegetables, and still qualify for subsidy payments. This plan offers farmers complete planting flexibility and a guaranteed subsidy payment.

The annual subsidy payments would be capped and gradually reduced during a seven-year period.

Farm subsidy payments would still exist after the seven years at budget-conscience amounts. The plan calls for a commission to be formed to recommend the role the federal government should play in agriculture after the year 2002.

Barry Flinchbaugh, professor in agriculture economics, said several factors are driving the farm bill debate.

The budget is the first factor. He said there is only one choice, and it is to reduce farm programs.

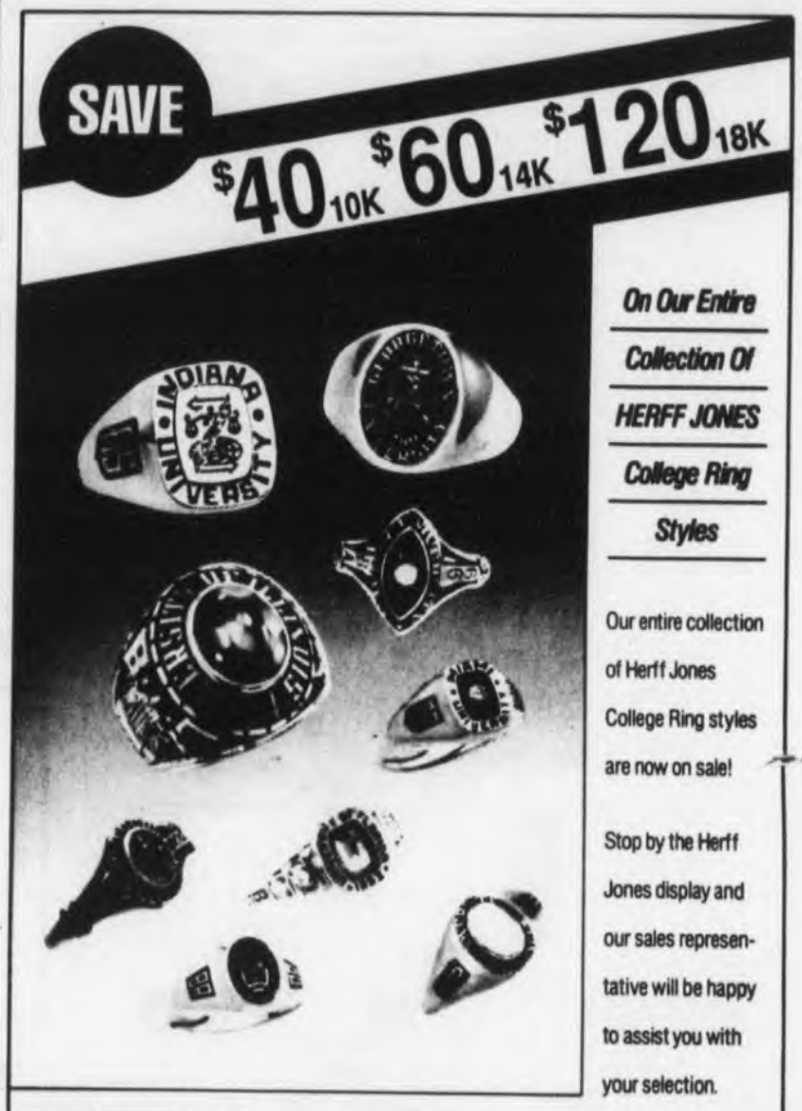
"If every other program had been cut 60 percent like farm programs, Congress would have to figure out how to spend the surplus," Flinchbaugh said.

The export market will also play a role in the success of farmer adaption to reduced farm subsidies. The issue is how much exports can be relied on to replace farm programs and subsidies, he said.

Also, the relationship between Southern and Midwestern agriculture will be a determining factor in the success of the bill, Flinchbaugh said.

Out of the 25 opposing votes, five were Republican. They were Reps. Bill Emerson, R-Mo.; Larry Combest, R-Texas; Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga.; Richard Baker, R-La., and Steve Gunderson, R-Wis.

The South has shown a strong opposition to the Freedom to Farm Act. Four out of the five opposing votes were cast by Southern representatives.



Rep. Gunderson, author of the dairy section of the bill, was the fifth opposing vote. He switched his vote so he could reintroduce the plan before the panel.

Under the Freedom to Farm Act, multi-commodity operations would not experience severe changes because operations are not solely based on grain commodities.

Some Kansas farmers said this could help them.

"Since we are both grain and livestock farmers, we probably were not quite as dependent on government payments as specific grain farmers were," LeRoy Miller, Wamego farmer and stockman, said.

Kent Stowell, Vliets farmer and stockman, said freedom to plant a mix of crops is acceptable to farmers and ranchers. Price will control what a farmer plants.

▶ MUSIC

Orchestra to celebrate founding of UN

Collegian staff

The KSU Orchestra will celebrate the 50th anniversary of the founding of the United Nations with its first concert of the season at 8 p.m. Tuesday at McCain Auditorium.

The free concert is sponsored by the K-State Department of Music and the Flint Hills Chapter of the United Nations Association of the United States of America.

David Littrell, KSU Orchestra conductor, has programmed four works for the concert.

The pieces that will kick off the celebration of the founding and purpose of the U.N. include Beethoven's "The Consecration of the House," Gorecki's "Symphony No. 3," Humperdinck's "Hansel & Gretel," and Sebelius's "Finlandia."

"The Consecration of the House" was written by Beethoven when he was completely deaf.

It was performed for the opening concert at the theater in Josefstadt, Vienna, on Oct. 3, 1822, only five years before Beethoven's death.

This dramatic overture contains fanfares and music befitting the opening ceremonies of a building or institution.

Gorecki's "Symphony No. 3" was composed in 1976.

It was done in a minimalist style considered reactionary for its time.

The antiwar sentiment is expressed in texts selected from Polish prayers, writings found on prison walls and a Polish folk song. Jean Sloop, professor of music, will be the soprano soloist.

Engelbert Humperdinck's opera "Hansel & Gretel" was written in 1893. Parts of the overture portray the innocence of children, especially in the hymn-like prayer at the beginning.

Littrell chose this composition as a dedication to UNICEF and the work it has done to better the lives of children throughout the world.

"Finlandia," composed by Sibelius in 1899 for a nationalist pageant, was intended to foster Finnish culture and to serve as a protest against Russian influence in Finland.

The KSU Men's Glee Club, with the direction of Gerald Polich, associate professor of music, will sing two stanzas during the middle section.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

RECENTLY, MORNINGSTAR CALLED US CHEAP.
IT'S NOT EVERY DAY YOU GET A COMPLIMENT LIKE THAT.

All financial companies charge operating fees and expenses—some more than others. Of course, the lower the expenses you pay, the better. That way more of your money goes where it should—towards building a comfortable future.

We make low expenses a high priority.

Because of our size and our exclusive focus on serving the needs of educational and research communities, TIAA-CREF's costs are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries.[1]

In fact, Morningstar, Inc.—one of the nation's leading sources of variable annuity and mutual fund information—says, "Size isn't a constraint; it...enables CREF to realize a remarkable economy of scale."[2] According to Morningstar's data, CREF's "minuscule" 0.31% average fund expense charge was less than half that charged by comparable funds.[3]

TIAA's traditional annuity also charges no fees aside from a very modest operating expense of 1/4 of 1% of annuity assets. Interest and dividends are reported after all operating costs have been deducted. Standard & Poor's calls TIAA's costs "exceptionally low."[4]

Of course, expenses are only one factor to consider when you make an investment decision. While we're committed to keeping our expenses down, we spare nothing in striving to provide top-quality investment choices, financial expertise, and personal service. Because that can make a difference in the long run, too.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

SEATTLE

Environment, population, resources, economy, culture and society are the types of indicators the project works with, he said.

The project's initial report of indicators was published in November 1993 and has been distributed to every state in the United States and in 20 to 30 countries.

"We're probably more well known nationally and internationally than with the citizens in Seattle," Conlin said.

The release of indicators in 1995 will hopefully increase local awareness, he said.

The project's definition is based on the definition of sustainability from the United Nations Brundtland Commission's 1987 report, "Our Common Future."

Sustainability is development that meets the need of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs, Conlin said.

"What people 100 years from now need and want may be vastly different than our needs and wants," he said.

The move toward sustainability requires looking at the whole picture, Conlin said.

For example, the salmon runs in Seattle are tied to all important areas of life.

It is an economic resource, an environmental key and a key indicator of water quality, and it is spiritual and religious, Conlin said.

"Sustainability is understanding the whole system and linking it together," Conlin said.

The linking of the salmon to the whole community was interesting, said Frank Miller, graduate student in regional and community planning.

"A lot of people don't understand that," Miller said.

Mayor Edith Stunkel said she was intrigued by the process that Sustainable Seattle has taken.

"It is the decentralized empowerment of citizens that make it work," Stunkel said.

The organization of the project is a model that can be used to face problems in cities today, Stunkel said.

"I would like to see something like this started in Manhattan or the region," Stunkel said.

Miller said students probably produce a lot of trash, and campuses should be active and take advantage of recycling.

"The road to sustainability takes a lot of experimentation, and sometimes we'll find that the experiments don't work," Conlin said.

But people need to think positively about the future and think that what they do matters, Conlin said.

"People won't act, unless they believe the action will be positive," he said.

not go home this year, and he will miss the festivities.

But Double 10 is not just one big party, Lin said. The holiday is also a time for Taiwanese to come together and show support for their country, he said.

"This is a time to remember your roots," Lin said. "We are happy to celebrate our now-democratic nation, and this is also our opportunity to share our culture."

The event attracts different people from surrounding big cities and people from all around the world, Lin said.

Another member from the association, Chin-Fen Li, graduate student in education, said even though she cannot be at home, she still feels a tie with her country.

"I'm not sure how they celebrate in the United States, because I'm a new student," Li said. "I don't feel like I'm missing anything, because I will read about it in my country's daily paper, and I still feel that I have a connection with my country."

To celebrate Double 10, the Taiwanese Student Association sponsored a tennis match last weekend and is sponsoring a Taiwanese Film Festival today. The movies are Taiwanese with English subtitles.
